

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE STUDY OF
AMERICAN LITERATURE

BY
BRANDER MATTHEWS, D.C.L.
PROFESSOR OF DRAMATIC LITERATURE IN COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY

1719
REVISED

AMERICAN BOOK COMPANY
NEW YORK CINCINNATI CHICAGO
BOSTON ATLANTA

COPYRIGHT, 1896, 1911, 1918, BY AMERICAN BOOK COMPANY.

INT. TO AM. LIT.

W. P. 30

PC

To my Friend and Colleague
NICHOLAS MURRAY BUTLER

PREFATORY NOTE

THIS book is intended as an introduction to the study of American literature. Although the chapters on the separate authors are wholly distinct, they have been so planned that each of them prepares the way for its successor, and that all of them together outline the changing circumstances under which American literature has developed. An attempt has been made to show how each of the chief American authors influenced his time, and how he in turn was influenced by it; and also to indicate how each of them was related to the others, both personally and artistically.

Bearing in mind the fact that the student needs to have his attention centered on vital points, all dates and all proper names, and all titles of books not absolutely essential, have been rigorously omitted. Interest has thus been concentrated on the literary career of each of the greater writers and on their practice of the literary art, in the hope and expectation that the student will be encouraged and stimulated to read their works for his own pleasure. After the consideration of these more important authors, one by one, the writers of less consequence have been discussed briefly in a single chapter; and in like manner a single chapter has been devoted to a summary consideration of the condition of our literature at the beginning of the twentieth century. No living author is named in the text.

To arouse the student's interest in the authors as actual men, the illustrations chosen have been confined to portraits and views, and to facsimiles of manuscripts. To enable him to see for himself the successive stages of the growth of American literature, and to let him discover how the authors sometimes came one after another and sometimes worked side by side, there has been appended also a chronological table of the chief dates in our literary history.

As mere text-book instruction can never be an adequate substitute for the student's own acquaintance with the actual works of the authors discussed, there have been annexed to every chapter bibliographical notes calling attention to the editions most suitable for the student's reading, and also to the best biographies and to a few of the most suggestive criticisms.

The thanks of the author and of the publishers are due to Miss Alice M. Longfellow, Professor Norton, Mr. H. G. O. Blake, Mr. Edward W. Emerson, Mr. Walter R. Benjamin, and Gen. J. G. Wilson, for kindly furnishing the original manuscripts herewith reproduced; to Mr. F. D. Stone, for aid in making a facsimile of Franklin's "Almanac"; and to Dr. Chas. H. J. Douglas of the Brooklyn Boys' High School, for preparing the most of the questions appended to every chapter—questions intended to be suggestive only and by no means exhaustive.

B. M.

CONTENTS

	PAGE
PREFATORY NOTE	5
I INTRODUCTION	9
II THE COLONIAL PERIOD	15
III BENJAMIN FRANKLIN	21
IV WASHINGTON IRVING	40
V JAMES FENIMORE COOPER	56
VI WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT	69
VII EDGAR ALLAN POE	81
VIII RALPH WALDO EMERSON	96
IX NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE	113
X HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW	127
XI JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER	141
XII OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES	158
XIII DAVID HENRY THOREAU	171
XIV JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL	178
XV FRANCIS PARKMAN	194
XVI DANIEL WEBSTER AND ABRAHAM LINCOLN	204
XVII "MARK TWAIN" (SAMUEL L. CLEMENS)	215
XVIII EUGENE FIELD AND JAMES WHITCOMB RILEY	227
XIX OTHER WRITERS	238
XX THE BEGINNING OF THE TWENTIETH CENTURY	246
CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE	252

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS

	PAGE		PAGE
THE COLONIAL PERIOD		OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES
Portrait of Cotton Mather	18	Portrait	158
Portrait of Jonathan Edwards	19	Birthplace	160
BENJAMIN FRANKLIN		Summer Residence, Beverly Farms, Mass.	165
Portrait	21	Facsimile Manuscript	168
Birthplace	23	HENRY DAVID THOREAU
Facsimiles of "Almanack"	26, 27	Portrait	171
Facsimile Manuscript	34, 35	Hut on Walden Pond	172
WASHINGTON IRVING		Facsimile Manuscript	176
Portrait	40	JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL
Facsimile Manuscript	46, 47	Portrait	178
Sunnyside	53	Elmwood, Cambridge, Mass.	182
JAMES FENIMORE COOPER		Facsimile Manuscript	191
Portrait	56	FRANCIS PARKMAN
Otsego Hall	57	Portrait	194
Facsimile Manuscript	61	Residence, Boston, Mass.	198
WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT		Facsimile Manuscript	201
Portrait	69	DANIEL WEBSTER AND ABRAHAM LINCOLN
Facsimile Manuscript	73	PORTRAITS OF:
Residence, Roslyn, L.I.	78	Thomas Jefferson	205
EDGAR ALLAN POE		Alexander Hamilton	206
Portrait	81	Daniel Webster	207
Facsimile Manuscript	88, 89	Abraham Lincoln	211
Cottage, Fordham, N.Y.	93	Facsimile Lincoln Manuscript	213
RALPH WALDO EMERSON		"MARK TWAIN"
Portrait	96	Portrait	215
Residence, Concord, Mass.	100	Facsimile Manuscript	221
Facsimile Manuscript	104, 105	Residence	223
NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE		EUGENE FIELD AND JAMES WHITCOMB RILEY
Portrait	113	PORTRAITS OF:
Birthplace	114	Joel Chandler Harris	229
The Old Manse	117	Bret Harte	229
Facsimile Manuscript	121	Eugene Field	230
The Wayside	123	James Whitcomb Riley	233
HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW		OTHER WRITERS
Portrait	127	PORTRAITS OF:
Birthplace	128	George Bancroft	238
Residence, Cambridge, Mass.	130	William H. Prescott	239
Facsimile Manuscript	136	Bayard Taylor	241
JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER		Edmund C. Stedman	242
Portrait	141	Walt Whitman	242
Birthplace	142	Harriet Beecher Stowe	244
Residence, Amesbury, Mass.	148
Facsimile Manuscript	152

AMERICAN LITERATURE

I INTRODUCTION

SINCE the invention of the art of writing, the story of the past is no longer kept alive by word of mouth only, the father telling the son, and the son, in turn, telling the grandson. It has been set down in black and white, by means of letters, so that we to-day can read the record of the feelings, the thoughts, and the acts of the people of two thousand years ago. And we, in our turn, are setting down our sayings and our doings, so that those who come after us will be able to understand what we felt, what we thought, and what we did. When this record is so skillfully made as to give pleasure to the reader, it is called literature.

Literature, then, is the reflection and the reproduction of the life of the people. It has existed ever since the invention of the art of writing, which enabled men to keep an account of the things they wished to remember. The literature of the past helps us to understand the lives of the peoples of the past. Greek literature tells us how the Greeks lived, and how they felt, what they thought, and what they did. Through Latin literature we get to know the ways of the old Romans; and, through Hebrew literature, we are enabled to understand the character of the Jewish race.

In like manner, English literature tells us about the life of the peoples who speak the English language. English literature is the record of the thoughts and the feelings and the acts of the great English-speaking race. This record extends a long way back into the past; but it is also being made to-day and every day; and it bids fair to be made for many centuries to come. Greek literature is dead, and Hebrew literature is dead; but English literature is alive now. It is the continuous account of the life of those who speak the English language, in the past, in the present, and in the future. Here in the United States, above the Great Lakes in Canada, across the Atlantic in Great Britain, afar on the other side of the Pacific in Australia and in India, there are now men and women keeping the record of their feelings, their thoughts, and their acts.

All that these men and these women write, if only it be so skillfully presented as to give pleasure to the reader, becomes at once a part of English literature. It is no matter where the authors live, whether in New York or in Montreal, in London, in Melbourne or in Calcutta, what they write in the English language belongs to English literature. It is no matter what the nationality of the author may be, whether he is a citizen of the United States or a subject of the British crown; if he uses the English language he contributes to English literature. This must be remembered always — that the record of the life of the peoples using the English language is English literature.

As literature is a reflection and a reproduction of the life of the peoples speaking the language in which it is written, this literature is likely to be strong and great in proportion as the peoples who speak the language are strong and great. English literature is therefore likely to grow, as it is the record of the life of the English-speaking race, and as this race is steadily spreading abroad over the globe.

It has been estimated that in the time of Chaucer less than three millions of men and women spoke English, and in the time of Shakspeare less than seven millions; and all these lived in the British Isles. But after a while the British Isles became too small for those who spoke English. Men and women went east and west out of England, and settled in the four quarters of the earth. They grew in numbers rapidly.

Another estimate shows that at the beginning of the nineteenth century probably about twenty millions of men and women spoke English, while about thirty-one millions spoke French, and about thirty millions spoke German. Now, at the end of the second decade of the twentieth century, it is believed that about fifty millions speak French, and nearly one hundred millions speak German, while nearly two hundred millions speak English. Our language is spreading far more rapidly than any other; and the prophecy has been made that at the end of the twentieth century the number of those who use the English language will be more than five hundred millions.

While those who speak German are still mostly in Germany, and those who speak French mostly in France, the most of those who speak English are no longer in England, for the total population of all the British Isles is now less than fifty millions. The largest single body of the English-speaking race has not even a political connection with England, for English is the language of the population of the United States, who now number more than one hundred millions. As the people of the United States are in no wise inferior to the people of Great Britain, it seems likely that hereafter the Americans, rather than the British, will be recognized as the chief of the English-speaking peoples.

So long as the English-speaking race dwelt only in the British Isles, English literature had to do only with British subjects. Now that the English-speaking race has settled itself also in America, and now more especially that the chief body of this race is not to be found in the British Isles but in the United States, it is needful to have terms to distinguish that portion of English literature which is written in the British Isles from that which is written in the United States.

Until the Declaration of Independence, the unity of the English race was unbroken; and until the end of the eighteenth century the stream of English literature had but a single channel. Since we in the United States began to have writers of our own, the record of our feelings, of our thoughts, and of our deeds may fairly be called American literature. It is still a part of English literature, for it is written in the English language. As Canada and as Australia are growing and prospering, there can be said to be already a Canadian literature and an Australian literature. And to distinguish the literature of the English-speaking race who continue to live in the British Isles from the literature of the Americans and the Canadians and the Australians, perhaps that had best be called British literature.

So, in the second decade of the twentieth century, we note that English literature, one in the past, has four divisions, — British, American, Canadian, and Australian. Of these, the British is still the most important, having the most great authors. But the American is second, and is growing sturdily and steadily. The English literature of the past is as much our glorious heritage as it is that of the British. It belongs to us as it belongs to them, and we have an equal pride in this splendid possession.

But as an American of to-day is unlike an Englishman in many points of custom and of taste, so American literature has begun to differ from British literature in many ways. Literature is a reflection and a reproduction of life, and as life in the United States is more and more unlike life in Great Britain, American literature must needs become more and more unlike British literature. We Americans, for the most part, come of the same stock as the British of to-day, but we have lived, for many generations, in another land, with another climate and under another social organization.

For more than a century now, the American has grown up in a republic free from feudal influences, without caste and class distinctions, with public schools open to rich and poor alike. All these things cannot but have had their effect upon us. We believe that there is a difference between the American and the Englishman — although it is not easy to declare precisely what that difference may be. We believe that there is such a thing as Americanism; and that there have been Americans of a type impossible elsewhere in the world. Washington and Franklin were typical Americans, different as they were; and so were Emerson and Lincoln, Farragut and Lowell. It was Lowell who found in President Hayes "that excellent new thing we call Americanism, which I suppose is that dignity of human nature . . . which consists, perhaps, in not thinking yourself either better or worse than your neighbors by reason of any artificial distinction." This Americanism has left its mark on the writings of the authors of the United States.

It is perhaps for this reason, and perhaps, also, because we all like to find ourselves in the books we read, that American writers are of more interest to us here in the United States than are the recent writers of the other great branch of English literature, the writers now living in the British Isles. British literature reproduces for us a life which is at once like ours, and unlike it. American literature reproduces for us our own life; it records our feelings, our thoughts, and our deeds; it enables us to see ourselves and our neighbors as we really are, or at least as we seem to ourselves to be; it explains us to ourselves. And therefore, even if American literature, which began only at the end of the eighteenth century, were inferior in quality as well as in quantity to the British literature of the twentieth century, yet it would be of more importance to us here in America. To learn how it came into being and who its founders were ought to be interesting to all of us.

QUESTIONS. — What is literature? Mention several historical divisions of the subject.

Trace the spread of the English-speaking race, from the time of Chaucer to the present day.

How has English literature come to have four geographical divisions?

What is meant by British literature?

What is the distinguishing characteristic of American literature?

NOTE. — The "Cambridge History of American Literature," in three volumes, which contains critical biographies by various writers and also full bibliographies, is useful for reference. (Putnam.) Also to be recommended are Whitcomb's "Chronological Outline of American Literature" (Macmillan); Stedman's "An American Anthology" (Houghton Mifflin); and Carpenter's "American Prose," (Macmillan).

II THE COLONIAL PERIOD

THE English settlements in North America began at a time when English literature had just reached its most glorious period. Shakspere was writing his plays when Captain John Smith first explored Chesapeake Bay. Milton was born the year before Henry Hudson first sailed up the noble river that now bears his name. Bacon published his great book on philosophical and scientific method only a few months before the landing of the Pilgrims on Plymouth Rock.

The men who left England for conscience' sake were many of them scholars with a love for learning. But in this fierce new land in which they sought to establish themselves, they had no time, at first, to do anything more than defend their lives, build their houses, plant their fields, and set up their churches and their schools. They were strong men, laboring mightily, and laying the broad foundations of the republic we live under to-day.

What they wrote then had always an immediate object. They set down in black and white their compacts, their laws, and their own important doings. They described the condition of affairs in the colonies to the kinsfolk and the friends they had left behind in the mother country. They prepared elaborate treatises in which they set forth their own vigorous ideas about religion. For singing songs or for telling tales, they had neither leisure nor taste; so we find no early American novelist and no early American poet.

Perhaps the beginnings of American literature are to be sought in the books written by the first adventurers for the purpose of giving an account of the strange countries in which they had traveled. Of these adventurers, the most interesting was Captain John Smith. He was born in England in 1579. As a lad, he ran away to become a soldier, and saw much fighting against the Turks. Taken prisoner, he was sold for a slave, but made his escape and went back to England.

In 1607 he was one of those who came over here to found a colony in Virginia. He himself records his being made captive by the Indians, and the saving of his life by Pocahontas, the daughter of the Indian chief, Powhatan. For more than ten years Smith kept coming to America, and exploring the bays and rivers of the coast from Virginia to New England. He published, in 1608, "A True Relation of such Occurrences and Accidents of Note as hath Happened in Virginia," the very first book about any of the English settlements in North America. In 1624 he was one of the authors of "The General History of Virginia, New England, and the Summer Isles." The last years of his life were spent in England, and he died in London in 1632. ♂

John Smith was the most picturesque figure in the early history of America; and his writings are like him — bold, free, highly colored. He was more picturesque than any of the solid scholars and the stalwart ministers of New England whom we find uniting in the making of what is now known as the "Bay Psalm Book." This was the first English book printed in America. It was published in 1640. Its full title was "The Whole Book of Psalms faithfully Translated into English Metre." The worthy divines who prepared this volume were not born poets; their verses are halting and their rimes are strained. As it has been said, these hymns "seem to have been hammered out on an anvil, by blows from a blacksmith's sledge."

THE COLONIAL PERIOD

Ten years later another volume of American verse was published, not in Massachusetts but in London. It was called "The Tenth Muse lately Sprung up in America," and it contained poems by Mistress Anne Bradstreet. They were written in the conventional and exaggerated manner then in vogue in England, and they reveal on her part no real observation of the new country in which she lived. She seems not to have seen the wide difference between the skies and the trees and the flowers and the birds of New England and those of the old England she had left as a bride. She was born in 1613 and she died in 1672. Among her descendants, alive two hundred years after her own death, were R. H. Dana, the author of "Two Years before the Mast," and Oliver Wendell Holmes, the author of the "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table."

After Mistress Bradstreet the New England writers next to be picked out for mention here are the Mathers. There were many of them, and most of them wrote abundantly. The more noteworthy were Increase Mather, born in 1639 and dying in 1723, and his son, Cotton Mather, born in 1663 and dying in 1728. The son wrote unceasingly and he was well equipped for authorship by deep learning. His own library was by far the largest of any then in private hands in America. It was said that "no native of his country had read so much and retained more of what he read."

Yet he was vain personally and his judgment was capricious. He was one of the most active in the persecution of the alleged witches of Salem in 1692. Three years before the trials of these unfortunate creatures he had published a volume on "Memorable Providences relating to Witchcrafts." Later in life he wrote his most useful book, "Essays to do Good," published in 1710. This was the volume which fell into Franklin's hands when he was a boy and gave him such a turn of thinking as had an abiding influence on his conduct through life.

Cotton Mather

The most of the writing done in New England in the seventeenth century had to do with religion, and so it was also in the early part of the eighteenth century. It was only as the Revolution began to loom up on the horizon that the interests of the church became less exciting than the interests of the state, and politics succeeded religion as the chief topic of the publications of the day.

The growth of the colonies in population and in resources was to give them the strength finally to break the bonds which united them to the British crown. Schools and colleges were established and newspapers were started, until at last there was no one of the little cities along the coast that had not its printing press. A spirit of independence was beginning to develop. In the early years of the eighteenth century there were Americans who thought for themselves and who wrote out boldly what they thought.

It was at the very beginning of the eighteenth century that the two men were born who are beyond all question the two greatest American authors coming to maturity before the revolution. These two men were Jonathan Edwards and Benjamin Franklin. They were products of the American soil and they grew up under American conditions. They were the first native Americans able to make a reputation on the other side of the Atlantic and to hold their own in debate with the best men of Europe. Of the two, Edwards was three years the older, and for that reason he may be considered here before Franklin. It is not to be questioned that Franklin is the more important of the two because of his services to the country as a whole and because he has left us one book, at least, which is still read, his delightful "Autobiography."

Jonathan Edwards was born in 1703 in Connecticut. When only twelve years old he entered Yale College, being graduated before he was seventeen. He studied for the ministry and was ordained.

While a student at Yale, and afterward when a tutor in the college, he paid attention to natural science, having the same wholesome curiosity that characterized Franklin. He even planned a book on this subject, and gathered many notes, the result of his own observations and experiments.

He studied electricity, having ideas about it long in advance of his time, and almost anticipating Franklin's discoveries. He also turned his acute and searching mind towards astronomy. But theology was at all times his chief study, and it is by his writings on religious subjects that he made his mark in the world.

He was settled as minister of a parish at the age of twenty-four, being then married. He brought up his family amid many privations. His health was poor but his spirit was always strong. He spent thirteen hours a day in his study. Even when he rode or walked he kept on thinking; and when from home he had a habit of pinning bits of paper to his clothes, one for every thought he wished to write down on his return, and he would sometimes get back with so many of these scraps that they fluttered all about him.

Jonathan Edwards

His great work on the "Freedom of the Will" was published in 1754. It is now but little read, for we no longer see the subject from Edwards's point of view. But it remains a monument of intellectual effort. To this day it is probably the most direct and subtle treatise on a philosophical theme written by any American. It justifies the assertion of more than one European critic that no work of the eighteenth century surpasses it in the vigor of its logic or in the sharpness of its argument. Jonathan Edwards died in 1758, a few days after he had been made president of Princeton College.

QUESTIONS. — What kind of men were the earliest English settlers in America? What did they put down in writing?

Give some account of the most interesting writer among the early adventurers to America.

Describe two examples of early colonial verse — one religious, the other secular.

What was Cotton Mather's connection with the Salem witchcraft trials?

What changes took place in the general spirit of American literature about the middle of the eighteenth century?

Give an account of the first native American writer who made a reputation in Europe.

NOTE. — There are brief biographies of Capt. John Smith by C. D. Warner (Holt); of Jonathan Edwards by A. V. G. Allen (Houghton Mifflin); and of Cotton Mather by Barrett Wendell (Dodd, Mead). See also M. C. Tyler's "History of American Literature" 1606-1783 (Putnam, 2 vols.), and the chapters on our colonial writers in vol. 1 of the "Cambridge History of American Literature" (Putnam).

III BENJAMIN FRANKLIN

At the beginning of the eighteenth century, when Queen Anne sat on the throne of Great Britain, there were ten British colonies strung along the Atlantic coast of North America. These colonies were various in origin and ill-disposed one to another. They were young, feeble, and jealous; their total population was less than four hundred thousand. In the colony of Massachusetts, and in the town of Boston, on January 17, 1706, was born Benjamin Franklin, who died in the state of Pennsylvania, and in the city of Philadelphia, on April 17, 1790.

In the eighty-four years of his life, Benjamin Franklin saw the ten colonies increase to thirteen; he saw them come together for defense against the common enemy; he saw them throw off their allegiance to the British crown; he saw them form themselves into these United States; he saw the population increase to nearly four millions; he saw the beginning of the movement across the Alleghanies which was to give us the boundless West and all our possibilities of expansion. And in the bringing about of this growth, this union, this independence, this development, the share of Benjamin Franklin was greater than the share of any other man.

With Washington, Franklin divided the honor of being the American who had most fame abroad and most veneration at home. He was the only man (so one of his biographers reminds us) who signed the Declaration of Independence, the Treaty of Alliance with France, the Treaty of Peace with England, and the Constitution under which we still live. But not only had he helped to make the nation—he had done more than any one else to form the individual. If the typical American is shrewd, industrious, and thrifty, it is due in a measure to the counsel and to the example of Benjamin Franklin. In "Poor Richard's Almanack" he summed up wisely, and he set forth sharply, the rules of conduct on which Americans have trained themselves now for a century and a half. Upon his countrymen the influence of Franklin's preaching and of his practice was wide, deep, and abiding. He was the first great American—for Washington was twenty-six years younger.

Benjamin was the youngest son of Josiah Franklin, who had come to America in 1682. His mother was a daughter of Peter Folger, one of the earliest colonists. His father was a soap-boiler and tallow-chandler; and as a boy of ten Benjamin was employed in cutting wick for the candles, filling the dipping molds, tending shop, and going on errands. He did not like the trade, and wanted to be a sailor. So his father used to take him to walk about Boston among the joiners, bricklayers, turners, and other mechanics, that the boy might discover his inclination for some trade on land.

Franklin tells us that from a child he was fond of reading, and laid out on books all the little money that came into his hands. Among the books he read as a boy were the "Pilgrim's Progress" and Mather's "Essays to do Good"; the latter gave him such a turn of thinking that it influenced his conduct through life and made him always "set a greater value on the character of a doer of good than on any other kind of reputation."

Franklin's Birthplace

It was this bookish inclination which determined his father to make a printer of him, and at the age of twelve he was apprenticed to his brother James. There was then but one newspaper in America — the Boston News-Letter, issued once a week. A second journal, the Boston Gazette, was started in 1719. At first James Franklin was its printer, but when it passed into other hands he began a paper of his own — the New England Courant, more lively than the earlier journals, and more enterprising. As Benjamin set up the type for his brother's paper, it struck him that perhaps he could write as well as some of the contributors. He was then a boy of sixteen, and already had he been training himself as a writer. He had studied Locke "On the Human Understanding," Xenophon's "Memorabilia [Memorable Things] of Socrates," and a volume of the "Spectator" of Addison and Steele. This last he chose as his model, mastering its methods, taking apart the essays to see how they were put together, and so finding out the secret of its simple style, its easy wit, its homely humor. His first attempts at composition were put in at night under the door of the printing house; they were approved and printed; and after a while he declared their authorship.

For a mild joke on the government James Franklin was forbidden to publish the New England Courant, so he canceled his brother's apprenticeship and made over the paper to Benjamin. But the indentures were secretly renewed; and the elder brother treated the younger with increasing harshness, giving him an aversion to arbitrary power which stuck to him through life.

At length the boy could bear it no longer, and he left his brother's shop. James was able to prevent him from getting work elsewhere in Boston, so Benjamin slipped off on a sloop to New York. Failing of employment there, he went on to Philadelphia, being then seventeen. He arrived there with only a "Dutch dollar" in his pocket. Weary and hungry, he asked at a baker's for a three-penny-worth of bread, and, to his surprise, he received three great puffy rolls. He walked off with a roll under each arm and eating the third; and he passed the house of a Mr. Read, whose daughter stood at the door, thinking the young stranger made a most awkward, ridiculous appearance, and little surmising that she was one day to be his wife.

Franklin worked at his trade in Philadelphia for nearly two years. In 1724 he crossed the ocean for the first time to buy type and a press, but was disappointed of a letter of credit Governor Keith had promised him. He found employment as a printer in London, and he came near starting a swimming school; but in 1726, after two years' absence, he returned to Philadelphia, and there he made his home for the rest of his life. He soon set up for himself as a printer; and, as he was more skillful than his rivals and more industrious, he prospered, getting the government printing and buying the Pennsylvania Gazette.

He married Deborah Read; and he made many friends, the closest of whom he formed into a club called the "Junto," devoted to inquiry and debate. At his suggestion the members of this club kept their books in common at the clubroom for a while; and out of this grew the first circulating library in America—the germ of the American public library system. And in 1732 he issued the first number of "Poor Richard's Almanack," which continued to appear every year for a quarter of a century.

It was "Poor Richard's Almanack" which first made Franklin famous, and it was out of the mouth of Poor Richard that Franklin spoke most effectively to his fellow-countrymen. He had noticed that the almanac was often the only book in many houses, and he therefore "filled all the little spaces that occurred between the remarkable days in the calendar with proverbial sentences, chiefly such as inculcated industry and frugality as the means of procuring wealth, and thereby securing virtue; it being

Poor RICHARD improved:

BEING AN ALMANACK
AND
E P H E M E R I S
OF THE
MOTIONS of the SUN and MOON;
THE TRUE
PLACES and ASPECTS of the PLANETS;
THE RISING and SETTING of the SUN;
AND THE Rising, Setting and Southing of the Moon;
FOR THE
YEAR of our LORD 1758:
Being the Second after LEAP-YEAR.

Containing also,

The Lunations, Conjunctions, Eclipses, Judgment of the Weather, Rising and Setting of the Planets, Length of Days and Nights, Fairs, Courts, Roads, &c. Together with useful Tables, chronological Observations, and entertaining Remarks.

Fitted to the Latitude of Forty Degrees, and a Meridian of near five Hours West from London; but may, without sensible Error, serve all the NORTHERN COLONIES.

By RICHARD SAUNDERS, Philom.

PHILADELPHIA

Printed and Sold by B. FRANKLIN, and D. HALL.

AUGUST hath xxxi Days.

D. H:

Planets Places.

New D 3 8 aft.

First Q. 11 11 aft.

Full ● 18 8 aft.

Last Q. 25 at noon.

{ 1 ☾ 25 Deg.

{ 11 24

{ 21 24

D.	☉	☿	♈	♉	♊	♋	♌	♍	♎	♏	D.L.
1	9	2	10	4	0	13	S.	1
6	14	2	10	7	6	23	N.	4
12	19	2	10	10	13	17	4
17	24	1	10	14	19	13	S.	1
22	29	1	11	17	25	21
27	17	4	1	11	20	11	28

D. H. rise of the Sun. Richard says, 'Tis foolish to lay out Money in a Purchase of Repentance; and yet this Folly is practised every Day at Vendues, for want of minding the Almanack. Wise Men, as Poor Dick says, learn by others Harms, Fools scarcely by their own; but, Felix quem faciunt aliena Pericula cautum. Many a one, for the Sake of Finery on the Back, have gone with a hungry Belly, and half starved their Families; Silks and Sattins, Scarlet and Velvets, as Poor Richard says, put out the Kitchen Fire. These are not the Necessaries of Life; they can scarcely be called the Conveniencies, and yet only because they look pretty, how many want to have them. The artificial Wants of Mankind thus become more numerous than the natural; and, as Poor Dick says, For one poor Person, there are an hundred indigent. By these, and other Extravagancies, the Genteel are reduced to Poverty, and forced to borrow of those whom they formerly despised, but who through Industry and Frugality have maintained their Standing; in which Case it appears plainly, that a Ploughman on his Legs is bigger than a Gentleman on his Knees, as Poor Richard says. Perhaps they have had a small Estate left them.

D

which

more difficult for a man in want to act always honestly, as, to use here one of these proverbs, 'It is hard for an empty sack to stand upright.' " By these pithy, pregnant sayings, carrying their moral home, fit to be pondered in the long winter evenings, Franklin taught Americans to be thrifty, to be forehanded, and to look for help from themselves only.

The rest of the almanac was also interesting, especially the playful prefaces; for Franklin was the first of American humorists, and to this day he has not been surpassed in his own line. The best of the proverbs — not original, all of them, but all sent forth freshened and sharpened by Franklin's shrewd wit — he "assembled and formed into a connected discourse, prefixed to the almanac of 1757, as the harangue of a wise old man to the people attending an auction."

Thus compacted, the scattered counsels sped up and down the Atlantic coast, being copied into all the newspapers. The wise "Speech of Father Abraham" also traveled across the ocean and was reprinted in England as a broadside to be stuck up in houses for daily guidance; it was twice translated into French — being probably the first essay by an American author which had a circulation outside the domains of our language. It has been issued since in German, Spanish, Italian, Russian, Dutch, Portuguese, Gaelic, and Greek. Without question it is what it has been called — "the most famous piece of literature the colonies produced."

No man had ever preached a doctrine which more skillfully showed how to get the best for yourself; and no man ever showed himself more ready than Franklin to do things for others. He invented an open stove to give more heat with less wood, but he refused to take out a patent for it, glad of an opportunity to serve his neighbors; and this invention of Franklin's was the beginning of the great American stove trade of to-day. He founded the first fire company in Philadelphia, and so made a beginning for the present fire departments. He procured the reorganization of the night watch and the payment of the watchmen, thus preparing for the regular police force now established. He started a Philosophical Society; and he took the lead in setting on foot an academy -- which survives to this day as the University of Pennsylvania.

While he was doing things for others, others did things for him, and he was made Clerk of the General Assembly in 1736, and Postmaster of Philadelphia in 1737. In 1750 he was elected a member of the Assembly, and in 1753 he was made Postmaster-general for all the colonies. In 1748 he had retired from business, having so fitted his practice to his preaching that he had gained a competency when but forty-two years old.

The leisure thus acquired he used in the study of electrical science, then in its infancy. He soon mastered all that was known, and then he made new experiments with his wonted ingenuity. He was the first to declare the identity of electricity and lightning. Using a wet string, he flew a kite against a thunder cloud, and drew a spark from a key at the end of a cord. The lightning rod was his invention. Of his investigations and experiments he wrote reports that were printed in England and translated in France. The Royal Society voted him a medal; the French king had the experiments repeated before him; and both Harvard and Yale made Franklin a Master of Arts.

But Franklin was not long allowed to live in philosophic retirement. When the French War broke out he was appointed one of the commissioners sent by Pennsylvania to a congress of the colonies held at Albany. He wrote a pamphlet which aided the enlisting of troops; and by pledging his own credit he helped General Braddock to get the wagons needed for the unfortunate expedition against Fort Duquesne. He drew up a Plan of Union on which the colonies might act together, and thus anticipated the Continental Congress of twenty years later.

In 1757, when Pennsylvania could no longer bear the interference of the governor appointed by the proprietors, Franklin was sent to London as the representative of his fellow-citizens. It was more than thirty years since he had left England, a journeyman printer; and now he returned to it, a man of fifty, the foremost citizen of Philadelphia, the author of "Father Abraham's Speech," and the discoverer of many new facts about electricity.

He was gone nearly five years, successfully pleading the cause of Pennsylvania, and publishing a pamphlet which helped to prevent the restoration of Canada to the French. Then he came home, to be met by an escort of five hundred horsemen, and to be honored by a vote of thanks from the Assembly.

But the dispute with the proprietors of the colony blazing forth again, Franklin was sent back to London once more to oppose the Stamp Act. He returned to England in 1764, at first as agent of Pennsylvania only, but in time as the representative of New Jersey, Georgia, and Massachusetts also; and he remained for more than ten years, pleading the cause of the colonists against the king, and explaining to all who chose to listen the real state of feeling in America. He did what he could to get the first Stamp Act repealed. He gave a good account of himself when he was examined by a committee of the House of Commons. He wrote telling papers of all sorts: one a set of "Rules for Reducing a Great Empire to a Small One," and another purporting to advance the claim of the King of Prussia to levy taxes in Great Britain--just as the King of England asserted the right to lay taxes on the Americans. He lingered in London, doing all he could to avert the war which he felt to be inevitable. At last, in 1775, less than a month before the battle of Lexington, he sailed for home.

On the day after he landed he was chosen a member of the Second Continental Congress. He acted as Postmaster-general. He signed the Declaration of Independence, making answer to Harrison's appeal for unanimity: "Yes, we must all hang together, or assuredly we shall all hang separately." Then there appeared to be a hope that France might be induced to help us; and in September, 1776, Franklin was elected envoy. Being then seventy years old, he went to Europe for the fourth time.

In France he received such a welcome as no other American had ever met with. He was known as an author, as a philosopher, as a statesman. The king and the queen, the court and the people, all were his friends. His portraits were everywhere, and his sayings were repeated by everybody. In the magnificence of the palace of Versailles Franklin kept his dignified simplicity; and with his customary sagacity he turned to the advantage of his country all the good will shown to himself. After Burgoyne's surrender the French agreed to an open alliance with the United States, and Franklin, with his fellow-commissioners, signed the treaty in 1778.

During the war Franklin remained in France as American Minister, borrowing money, forwarding supplies, exchanging prisoners, and carrying on an immense business on behalf of his country. As one of his biographers remarks, Franklin "stood in the relation of a navy department" to John Paul Jones when that hardy sailor was harassing the British coasts in the "Bonhomme Richard," — as his vessel was named, after "Poor Richard." He bore the brunt of the countless difficulties which beset the American representatives in Europe. At last Cornwallis surrendered; and, with Adams and Jay, Franklin signed the treaty of peace with Great Britain, in September, 1783. The next year Jefferson went to France, and in 1785 relieved Franklin, who was allowed to return to America, being then seventy-nine years of age.

His "Autobiography," which he had begun in 1771 in England, and had taken up again in France in 1783, he hoped to be able to finish now that he was at home again and relieved from the responsibility of office. But he was at once elected a councillor of Philadelphia, and although he would have liked the leisure he had so hardly earned, he felt that he had no right to refuse this duty. Then was the "critical period of American history," and Franklin was kept busy writing to his friends in Europe encouraging and hopeful accounts of our affairs.

When the constitutional convention met, Franklin was made a member "that, in the possible absence of General Washington, there might be some one whom all could agree in calling to the chair." After the final draft of the Constitution was prepared, Franklin made a speech pleading for harmony, and urging that the document be sent before the people with the unanimous approbation of the members of the convention. Then, while the last members were signing, he said that he had seen a sun painted on the back of the President's chair, and during the long debates when there seemed little hope of an agreement he had been in doubt whether it was taken at the moment of sunrise or sunset ; " but," he said, " now at length I have the happiness to know that it is a rising and not a setting sun."

He was now a very old man. He said himself : " I seem to have intruded myself into the company of posterity, when I ought to have been abed and asleep." His cheerfulness never failed him, and although he suffered much, he bore up bravely. " When I consider," he wrote in 1788, " how many more terrible maladies the human body is liable to, I think myself well off that I have only three incurable ones : the gout, the stone, and old age." He looked forward to death without fear, writing to a friend that, as he had seen " a good deal of this world," he felt " a growing curiosity to be acquainted with some other."

For a year or more before his death he was forced to keep his bed. When at last the end was near and a pain seized him in the chest, it was suggested that he change his position and so breathe more easily. " A dying man can do nothing easily," he answered ; and these were his last words. He died April 17, 1790, respected abroad and beloved at home.

In many ways Franklin was the most remarkable man who came to maturity while these United States were yet British colonies ; and nothing, perhaps, was more remarkable about him than the fact that he was never " colonial " in his attitude. He stood before kings with no uneasy self-consciousness or self-assertion ; and he faced a committee of the House of Commons with the calm strength of one thrice armed in a just cause. He never bragged or blustered ; he never vaunted his country or himself. He was always firm and dignified, shrewd and good-humored.

Paris Nov. 20. 1786.

Dear Friend,

I hope soon to be in a situation when I can write largely and fully to my friends in France, without the perpetual Interruptions I now daily meet with. At present I can only tell you that I am well

And that I esteem you,
And C. Abbi's Morallet,
And M. Labbanis,
And love dear Madge
Forever, Infinitely.

Adieu,
Yours most affectionately

I received several productions of the Academy at Antwerp which gave me great pleasure.

W. Franklyn

Humor, indeed, he had so abundantly that it was almost a failing. Like Abraham Lincoln, another typical American, he never shrank from a jest. Like Lincoln, he knew the world well and accepted it for what it was, and made the best of it, expecting no more. But Franklin lacked the spirituality, the faith in the ideal, which was at the core of Lincoln's character. And here was Franklin's limitation: what lay outside of the bounds of common sense he did not see—probably he did not greatly care to see; but common sense he had in a most uncommon degree.

One of his chief characteristics was curiosity—in the wholesome meaning of that abused word. He never rested till he knew the why and the wherefore of all that aroused his attention. As the range of his interests was extraordinarily wide, the range of his information came to be very extended also. He was thorough, too; he had no tolerance for superficiality; he went to the bottom of whatever he undertook to investigate. He had the true scientific spirit. He loved knowledge for its own sake, although he loved it best, no doubt, when it could be made immediately useful to his fellow-men. In science, in politics, in literature, he was eminently practical; in whatever department of human endeavor he was engaged, he brought the same qualities to bear. For the medal which was presented to Franklin in France the great statesman Turgot composed the line: and it was true that Franklin had faced the ministers of George III. with the same fearless eye that had gazed at the thunder cloud.

*Eripuit cœlo fulmen sceptrumque tyrannis*¹;

¹ He has seized the lightning from heaven and the scepter from tyrants.

There is an admirable series in course of publication containing the lives of American men of letters, and there is an equally admirable series containing the lives of American statesmen. In each of these collections there is a volume devoted to Benjamin Franklin; and if there were also a series of American scientific men, the story of Franklin's life would need to be told anew for that also. No other American could make good his claim to be included even in two of these three collections.

As science advances, the work of the discoverers of the past, even though it be the foundation of a new departure, may sink more and more out of sight. As time goes on, and we prosper, the memory of our indebtedness to each of the statesmen who assured the stability of our institutions may fade away. But the writer of a book which the people have taken to heart is safe in their remembrance; and, perhaps, to-day it is as the author of his "Autobiography" that Franklin is best known. If he were alive, probably nothing would surprise him more than that he should be ranked as a man of letters, for he was not an author by profession. He was not moved to composition by desire of fortune or of fame; he wrote always to help a cause, to attain a purpose; and the cause having been won, the purpose having been achieved, he thought no more about what he had written. He had a perfect understanding of the people he meant to reach, and of the means whereby he could best reach them.

Most of these writings were mere journalism, to be forgotten when its day's work was done; but some of them had so much merit of their own that they have survived the temporary debate which called them into being. Wit is a great antiseptic, and it has kept sweet the "Whistle," the "Petition of the Left Hand," the "Dialogue between Franklin and the Gout," and the lively little essay on the "Ephemera." Wisdom is not so common even now that men can afford to forget "Father Abraham's Speech," the "Necessary Hints to Those that would be Rich," and "Digging for Hidden Treasure." Much of his fun is as fresh and as unforced now as it was a century and a half ago. Much of the counsel he gives so pleasantly, so gently, so wisely, is as needful now as it was when "Poor Richard" sent forth his first almanac.

He taught his fellow-countrymen to be masters of the frugal virtues. He taught them to attain to self-support that they might be capable of self-sacrifice. He taught them not to look to the government for help, but to stand ready always to help the government if need be. There are limits to his doctrine, no doubt; and there are things undreamt of in Franklin's philosophy. Yet, his philosophy was good so far as it went; in its own field to this day there is no better. Common sense cannot comprehend all things; but it led Franklin to try to help people to be happy, for he believed that this was the best way to make them good.

It was by watching and by thinking that Franklin arrived at his wisdom; and it was not by chance that he was able to set forth his views so persuasively. Skill in letters is never a lucky accident. How rigorously he trained himself in composition he has told us in the "Autobiography"—how he pondered on his parts of speech and practiced himself in all sorts of literary gymnastics. And of the success of his training there is no better proof than the "Autobiography" itself. It is a marvelous volume, holding its own to-day beside "Robinson Crusoe," as one of the books which are a perpetual delight to young and to old, to the scholar familiar with Franklin's achievements, and to the boy just able to spell out its simplest sentences. It is one of the best books of its kind in any language, and it abides as the chief monument of Benjamin Franklin's fame.

QUESTIONS. — Tell the story of Franklin's life in Boston.

Describe the publication that first made Franklin famous.

Mention several facts which go to show that Franklin preached selfishness in order that he might encourage philanthropy. How did he spend his leisure?

Trace Franklin's public career before the war for independence.

Speak of his public services during the war.

What things happened to prevent Franklin from completing, during the critical period of American history, a literary work upon which he had long been engaged?

Describe Franklin's last years.

Show how Franklin's chief characteristic was manifested in his life.

In what three fields was Franklin famous?

How was Franklin able to invest his writings with the qualities that have preserved them from sharing the neglect usually bestowed upon productions of their class?

NOTE. — The best edition of Franklin's complete works, including his correspondence, is that in 10 volumes by A. H. Smyth (Macmillan). The fullest edition of the "Autobiography" is that of John Bigelow (Lippincott, 3 vols.). There is a condensed edition in the Riverside Literature series (Houghton Mifflin); and the same series has also one number containing "Poor Richard's Almanack" and other selections from Franklin's writings.

There are biographies by James Parton (Houghton Mifflin, 2 vols.), by J. T. Morse, Jr. in the American Statesmen series (Houghton Mifflin), by J. B. McMaster in the American Men of Letters series (Houghton Mifflin), and by Paul Leicester Ford (Century).

IV WASHINGTON IRVING

THE first American man of letters, Benjamin Franklin, was a man of letters only incidentally, and, as it were, accidentally; for he was a printer by trade, a politician by choice, and never an author by profession.

The first American who frankly adopted literature as a calling, and who successfully relied on his pen for his support, was Washington Irving. The first American who was a professed author was not Franklin, who was born a Bostonian and who died a Philadelphian; but Irving, who was born, who lived, and who died a New Yorker.

Washington Irving's father was a Scotchman who had settled in New York a dozen years before the Revolution. During the British occupation of Manhattan Island, the Irvings were stanch patriots, and did what they could to relieve the sufferings of the American prisoners in the city. A few months before the evacuation day, which the inhabitants of New York were to keep as a holiday for a century after, Washington Irving was born, on April 3, 1783, being, like Benjamin Franklin, the youngest of many sons. The boy was not baptized until after Washington and his army had entered the city. "Washington's work is ended," said the mother, "and the child shall be named after him."

New York came out of the Revolution half in ruins, and wasted by its long captivity; its straggling streets filled only the toe of the island, and it had less than twenty-five thousand inhabitants. But the little city began to grow again as soon as peace returned. It was in New York, in 1789, that Washington took the oath as the first President of these United States. One day not long thereafter a Scotch maidservant of the Irvings, struck with the enthusiasm which everywhere greeted the great man, followed him into a shop with the youngest son of the family, and said, "Please, your honor, here's a bairn was named for you." Washington placed his hand on the head of the boy, and gave him his blessing.

New York was then the capital of the country; it was a spreading seaport; it retained many traces of its Dutch origin; it had in its streets men of every calling and of every color. Here the boy grew up happy, going to school and getting knowledge out of books, but also lingering along the pier heads, and picking up the information to be gathered in that best of universities — a great city.

He was playful rather than studious; and although two of his brothers had been educated at Columbia College, he neglected to enter—a blunder which he regretted all his life, and which Columbia regrets to this day. Perhaps the fault may be charged to his poor health, for the sake of improving which he began to live much in the open air, making voyages up the Hudson in sloops that then plied as packets between New York and Albany. The first sail through the Highlands was to him a time of intense delight, and the Catskill Mountains had the most witching effect on his boyish imagination. Nowadays we are used to hearing the Hudson praised, but it was Irving who first proclaimed its enchanting beauty; and it was when he was a dreaming youth that he discovered its charm.

Much against the grain he began to read law, but his studies were only fitful. One of his brothers established a daily paper in 1802; and to this Washington, then only nineteen, contributed a series of occasional essays under the signature of "Jonathan Oldstyle." These were humorous and sportive papers, and they were copied far and wide, as the sayings of Poor Richard had been quoted fifty years before.

The next summer, Irving made a journey up the Mohawk, to Ogdensburg, and thence to Montreal. The year after, being then just twenty-one, his brothers sent him to Europe in the hope that the long sea voyage and the change of scene might restore him to health. Irving had to be helped up the side of the ship, and the captain said to himself, "There's a chap who will go overboard before we get across." The voyage did him good, and from Bordeaux he went to Genoa; he pushed on as far as Sicily, and came back to Rome; then turned north to Paris, and finally crossed over to London. After a year and a half of most enjoyable wandering he took ship again for home, and arrived safely in New York after a stormy passage of sixty-four days.

Washington Irving now returned to the study of law, and he was soon admitted to the bar—a proof rather of the mercy of the examiners than of the amount of his legal knowledge. He never made any serious attempt to earn his living as a lawyer. Only a few weeks after his admission, he, his brother William, and his friend James K. Paulding, sent forth the first number of “Salmagundi,” an irregular periodical suggested, perhaps, by the “Spectator” of Addison and Steele, but droller, more waggish, and with sharper shafts for folly as it flies. The first number was published in January, 1807, and caused not only great amusement, but also much wonder as to the real names of the daring authors. The twentieth, and final number, appeared a year later. Irving always spoke of it as a very juvenile production, and such it is, no doubt; but it was brisk and lively, indeed it was brighter than anything of the kind yet written in America; and in the papers contributed by Washington Irving we can see the germs of certain of his later works.

One of these papers pretended to be a chapter from “The Chronicles of the Renowned and Ancient City of Gotham,”¹ and Irving’s next literary undertaking was a burlesque history of New York, which he and his brother Peter undertook to write together. The brothers had heaped up many notes when Peter was called away, and Washington, changing the plan of the book, began to write it alone. He started on his labor joyful and happy, but he ended it in the depths of sorrow. He was in love with Miss Matilda Hoffman, a charming and graceful girl, and their marriage had been agreed on. Suddenly, having caught a bad cold, which went to her lungs, after a brief illness she died. Irving, then twenty-six, bore the blow like a man, but he carried the scar to the grave. To his most intimate friends he never mentioned her name. For several months after her death he wandered aimlessly, unable to apply himself to anything. Then he went back to his work, and finished the burlesque history of New York. It may seem strange that a book of such bubbling humor should be the result of those days of darkness; but as has often happened in literature, the writings at which people laugh longest are the work of men who are grave rather than gay.

¹ Gotham was an English village proverbial for the blundering simplicity of its inhabitants. Irving humorously applied the name to New York.

"A History of New York, by Diedrich Knickerbocker," was published in December, 1809. It was a playful parody of the annals of New Amsterdam, laughing at the Dutch burghers who had founded the capital of New Netherlands, and making fun of their manners and their customs. In the method of the author there was more than a trace of the manner of "Don Quixote," and its irony was as gentle and as good-natured. That "Knickerbocker" was received with acclamation there is no wonder. It was the most readable book which had yet appeared in America—for Franklin's "Autobiography" did not get into print until 1817. At home it gave a name to a time in New York's history and to a set of the city's traditions, a name even now in popular use, for every one knows what is meant when we speak of a person or a thing as a "Knickerbocker." Abroad it revealed to the critics that American life was to have its own literature. Scott read the book aloud to his family. The book still delights all who can appreciate its delicate fun ; nowadays our taste in humor is more highly spiced than it was when "Knickerbocker" appeared, but it is not purer.

The protests which a few descendants of the Dutch founders of the city ventured to put forth were laughed aside, for the public had taken the joke and were unwilling to have the fun spoiled. Yet it is to be regretted that, in his youth, Irving should have echoed the British scoffs at the Dutch. We are rarely fair to our rivals, and the Dutch had not only taught the British agriculture and commerce, but they had swept the British Channel with a broom at their admiral's masthead ; and so the British disliked them. Foremost in art, and in law, and in education, the Dutch had exerted a most wholesome influence on American institutions—the chief of which, our common-school system, was probably derived from Holland. Irving did not think of this when he made fun of the Dutchmen of New Amsterdam, or he did not know it. There was no malice in his satire ; but thoughtlessness sometimes hurts as severely.

For ten years after the publication of "Knickerbocker," Irving brought forth no new work. He lingered and loitered and hesitated. He went to Washington for a season, and he edited a magazine in Philadelphia. When the War of 1812 broke out, he was stanchly patriotic, although he deplored the war itself. After hostilities had lasted for some months, he felt it was his duty to offer his services to the governor of New York, and was appointed aid and military secretary. In 1815, after peace was proclaimed, he made another voyage across the Atlantic to England to see his brother. Intending only a brief visit, he was absent from home, as it happened, for seventeen years.

Conversations with Salma

From bright water in a common place book

By the author of the Skated Book

Paris April 25th 1821. — made a ^{call} visit with a friend this morning, to Salma the great French tragedian. He has a suite of apartments in a hotel in the Rue de la Harpe
Angustines but is about to build a house

Residence. He has also a country retreat a few miles from Paris of which he is himself Lord, and is continually altering and improving it. He had just arrived from the country and his apartment was rather in confusion; the furniture out of place and books lying about. In a conspicuous part of the saloon was a column engraving of John Rumble for whom he expresses great admiration and regard.

Salva is about five feet seven or eight

In England and in Scotland he met the literary celebrities of the day, among them Sir Walter Scott. At last he turned again to literature, and the first number of "The Sketch Book of Geoffrey Crayon, Gent." was published in New York in 1819. The "Sketch Book" was a miscellany of essays, sketches, and tales. As Irving wrote to a friend, he had "attempted no lofty theme, nor sought to look wise and learned." "I have preferred," he said, "addressing myself to the feeling and fancy of the reader more than to his judgment." The first number contained the "Voyage to England" and "Rip Van Winkle." Its success was instant and remarkable. As the following numbers appeared, they began to be reprinted in British periodicals; and so Irving, still detained in England, gathered the first four numbers into a volume and issued it in London. The series extended to seven numbers in America; and on both sides of the Atlantic the complete book was published in two volumes toward the end of 1820. Thereafter Irving had a secure place in the history of English literature.

The charm of the "Sketch Book" is not difficult to define. Sunshine lights up every page, and a cheerful kindness glows upon them all. From the "Sketch Book" we must date the revival of Christmas feasting, although, no doubt, Irving was aided powerfully by Dickens, who took the American as his model in more ways than we are wont to remark. It is the "Sketch Book" which has sent thousands of Americans across the Atlantic, passionate pilgrims to Stratford, entranced wanderers through Westminster Abbey, and happy loiterers in the country churchyards of England. Although in the second number of the "Sketch Book," Irving warned "English Writers on America" that their ill-considered reports were likely to cause ill will, no American ever felt more kindly toward England; and when he died, Thackeray, calling him "the first ambassador whom the New World of Letters sent to the Old," praised him for his constant good will to the mother country.

Though Irving was stalwart in his Americanism always, — he refused, for example, to write for the Quarterly Review, because it had ever been a bitter enemy to America — he had a sincere liking for England, and a hearty appreciation of its picturesque possibilities. This was shown to advantage in his next book, "Bracebridge Hall," published in 1822; and it was seen even in the book that followed this — the "Tales of a Traveler," published in 1824. These two collections may be described not unfairly as continuations of the "Sketch Book," the former containing chiefly essays and sketches, and the latter, only short stories and character portraits. There is in all the libraries of England no book more filled with the gentle spirit of English country life than "Bracebridge Hall"; and Irving himself never wrote a more delicately humorous sketch than the "Stout Gentleman," in that volume.

In the history of the short-story, one of the most useful as it is one of the most popular of literary forms, Irving holds a high place. The "Sketch Book" owed much of its success to "Rip Van Winkle" and the "Legend of Sleepy Hollow" — tales of a kind till then unknown in English literature; and "Dolph Heyliger," in "Bracebridge Hall," is a worthy third, while "Wolfert Webber," in the "Tales of a Traveler," is not far behind. Considering their strength, Irving's short-stories have a singular simplicity; they are slight in plot and simple in the character drawing. He understood his own powers clearly. "I consider a story merely as a frame on which to stretch my materials," so he wrote to a friend; "it is the play of thought, and sentiment, and language; the weaving in of characters, lightly yet expressively delineated; the familiar and faithful exhibition of scenes of common life; and the half-concealed vein of humor that is often playing through the whole; these are among what I aim at."

This is a fair statement of the qualities which give charm to "Rip Van Winkle" and its fellows. Little did Irving foresee that these tales of his were but the first fruits of that abundant harvest, rich in local flavor, which later American story tellers were to raise, each on his own half acre. Hawthorne and Poe, Bret Harte and Aldrich, are all followers in Irving's footsteps.

It was while Byron and Scott were the leaders of English letters that Irving published the "Sketch Book," and made good his own title to an honorable position in literature. By the publication of "Bracebridge Hall," and of the "Tales of a Traveler," his footing became firmer, no doubt; but he did not advance further. Irving was in Spain in 1826, and there he remained for more than three years—the most laborious and fruitful years of his life. He had gone to Spain to translate some important Spanish documents concerning Columbus; but getting interested in the character and in the career of Columbus, he soon settled down to the preparation of a biography of his own. He took his task seriously; he spared no pains in getting every date right and every proper name exact; he rewrote as often as he discovered new material. He knew that a biography was not a work of fiction, to be warped at the will of the writer, but rather a monument to be built slowly out of actual facts.

When the "Life of Columbus" appeared in 1828, it was seen at once that Irving had not only the gift of the born story teller, but also the sterner virtues of the historian.

To this day, despite the storm of dispute which has raged over every item of Columbus's career, Irving's biography remains a valuable authority. A most devoted student of the details of Columbus's life has declared that Irving's "is a history written with judgment and impartiality, which leaves far behind it all descriptions of the discovery of the New World published before or since." If to-day it were edited with notes embodying the latest information, it would hold its own against all newcomers. The reader sees a completed painting, and not the raw materials out of which he is invited to make a picture for himself.

The "Life of Columbus" was soon followed by a book about the "Companions of Columbus," and by the "Chronicle of the Conquest of Granada," which Irving regarded as his best work, and which Coleridge greeted as a masterpiece of its kind. Just what its kind is, it is not easy to declare, but perhaps it may be described as a record of fact presented with the freedom the author had used in writing fiction. In the main, it is a true story, but it is as obedient to the hands of the story teller as though he had made it up. The narrative is spirited, the style is delightful, and there is a never-ending play of sentiment and humor.

These are the qualities which grace yet another Spanish book, the "Alhambra," perhaps the most fascinating of all Irving's writings. The "Alhambra" is a medley of travel, sketches, character studies, and brief tales; it is what Prescott called it: a Spanish "Sketch Book." The method of the author is the same as in his "Sketch Book," only he has changed the model who poses before him. "Bracebridge Hall" is not more English than the "Alhambra" is Spanish. It is full of the sights and the sounds of Spain; and it is pleasant to gaze upon this reflection of Moorish architecture and Iberian landscape and Spanish character in the clear mirror held up to nature by the genial New Yorker.

The "Alhambra" was published in 1832, and after an absence of seventeen years, Irving returned to his native city. He found New York wonderfully expanded; in the scant half-century of his life, the twenty thousand population had increased to two hundred thousand. He was made heartily welcome, and his fellow-citizens promptly bestowed on him the compliment of a public dinner. From that day to his death he was the acknowledged head of American letters. He bore his honors as easily as he bore all things.

He made a home for himself in the village of Tarrytown, New York, on the banks of the Hudson he loved, and near the Sleepy Hollow he had celebrated. Here, in the stone cottage of Sunnyside, he settled down, enjoying the leisure which now and again he varied by periods of hard labor. He made a tour on the prairies; he wrote an account of the settlement of Astoria in Oregon; he put into shape the travels of Captain Bonneville; and he began work on a history of the conquest of Mexico, but with his wonted generosity he surrendered the subject to Prescott when he was told that the younger author was about to undertake it.

Thus ten years passed away; and in 1842 Irving was making ready to write the life of Washington, when he was surprised by the appointment of Minister to Spain. Daniel Webster was then Secretary of State, and he knew no American could be more welcome in Spain than the biographer of Columbus. A foreign appointment is almost the only honor a republic can bestow upon its foremost authors; the first of American men of letters, Benjamin Franklin, had been Minister to France; and after Irving, similar positions were to be held by Motley, and Bancroft, and Lowell. Irving accepted the appointment, and spent four years in Madrid, with occasional visits to Paris and to London. Then in 1846 he came home again, and settled down at Sunnyside for the last thirteen years of his happy life.

Among the labors of these later years were the extending of an earlier and briefer biography of Goldsmith, an account of Mahomet and his contemporaries, and a volume of miscellanies, called "Wolfert's Roost," containing sketches and stories like those in the "Sketch Book" and the "Alhambra." Tarrytown is only a few miles from New York, and Irving was a frequent visitor to the city of his birth. He has been described as walking along Broadway with his head "slightly inclined to one side, the face . . . smoothly shaven," and the eyes "twinkling" with kindly humor and shrewdness. There was a chirping, cheery, old-school air in his whole appearance.

Sunnyside

Washington Irving was at that time perhaps the best known of living Americans; and he was then engaged on the biography of the best known of all Americans alive or dead. The first volume of Irving's "Life of Washington," appeared in 1855, and the work was completed in 1859. Irving was doubtful about its reception, but it became instantly popular; it had a very large sale, and it was lauded by his fellow-historians. Bancroft praised the style, calling it "masterly, clear, easy." Prescott wrote: "You have done with Washington just as I thought you would, and, instead of a cold marble statue of a demigod, you have made him a being of flesh and blood, like ourselves — one with whom we can have sympathy."

In the year in which the final volume of the "Washington" was published, Irving died at Sunnyside on November 28, 1859, being then seventy-six years old. American men of letters are a long-lived race; Franklin, Emerson, Bryant, and Whittier lived to be older than Irving, while Longfellow and Lowell were only a little younger at their deaths. Like Irving, they all died full of years and full of honors; they all had led happy lives.

No later American writer has surpassed him in charm. Before Irving had discovered the beauty of the Hudson, the river was as lovely as it is to-day, but its legends were little known. He it was who peopled the green nooks of Sleepy Hollow and the rocky crags of the Catskills. His genius was not stalwart or rugged, and it did not conquer admiration; it won its way softly, by the aid of sentiment and of humor. "Knickerbocker's History," and the "Sketch Book," and the "Alhambra," are his titles to fame; not the "Columbus" or the "Washington." He had the conscience of the historian and he could color his narrative artistically and give it movement; but others could do this as well as he. But to call into being a civilization, to give to a legend the substance of truth, to present a fiction, so that it passes for fact and is accepted by the people and gets into common speech—this is a feat very few authors have ever accomplished. Irving did it, and his greatest work is not any one of his books—it is the Knickerbocker legend.

QUESTIONS.—What events were happening in and around New York during the early years of Irving's life?

What can you say about "Salmagundi"?

Describe Irving's first important literary work.

How was Irving occupied during the ten years that followed the publication of "Knickerbocker"?

What was Thackeray's characterization of Irving?

Discuss Irving's place in the history of the short-story.

Comment upon four books which grew out of Irving's third visit to Europe.

How were the ten years of Irving's life passed after his return home?

Describe his last great literary work.

What was the nature of Irving's genius?

NOTE.—The authorized edition of Irving's works is published by Putnam (12 vols.), who has also issued in 2 vols. the correspondence of Irving with Henry Brevoort. There are many annotated editions of the "Sketch Book" and the "Tales of a Traveler."

There are biographies by Pierre M. Irving (Putnam, 3 vols.) and by C. D. Warner in the American Men of Letters series (Houghton Mifflin).

For criticism, see Lowell's "Fable for Critics"; Thackeray's "Nil Nisi Bonum" in "Roundabout Papers" (Houghton Mifflin); C. D. Warner's "Work of Washington Irving" (Harper); W. D. Howells in "My Literary Passions" (Harper); and G. W. Curtis in "Literary and Social Essays" (Harper).

V JAMES FENIMORE COOPER

As Irving was the first American author whose writings won favor outside of his native land, so another New Yorker, James Fenimore Cooper, was the first American author whose works gained a wide circulation outside of his native tongue. While the "Sketch Book" was as popular in Great Britain as in the United States, the "Spy," and the "Pilot," and the "Last of the Mohicans," were as popular on the continent of Europe as they were in America, North and South. To the French and the Germans, to the Italians and the Spaniards, James Fenimore Cooper is as well known as Walter Scott. Irving was the first American writer of short-stories, but Cooper was the first American novelist; and, to the present day, he is almost the only American novelist whose fame is solidly established among foreigners.

Born at Burlington, New Jersey, on September 15, 1789, Cooper was taken in infancy to Otsego Lake in the interior of New York; and here, at the point where the Susquehanna streams forth on its way to join the distant Chesapeake, Cooper's father built the stately mansion called Otsego Hall. The elder Cooper was the owner of many thousand acres along the head waters of the Susquehanna, and in this wilderness, centering around the freshly founded village of Cooperstown, the son grew into boyhood. He could pass his days on the beautiful lake, shut in by the untouched forest, or in the woods themselves which rose with the hills and fell away into the valleys. He slept at night amid the solemn silence of a little settlement, a hundred miles beyond the advancing line of civilization.

Otsego Hall

Hard as it may be for us to realize it to-day, at that time "the backwoods" were in the state of New York. It was only during the Revolution that the people of our stock made ready to push their way across the Alleghanies. For years after the nineteenth century had begun, the only white men who sped down the Mississippi, or toiled slowly up against its broad current, spoke another tongue than ours. Although Cooper lived in New York, it was in the backwoods that he spent his childhood, and to Cooperstown he returned at intervals throughout his life. Backwoods scenes and backwoods characters he could always recall at will from his earliest recollections. The craft of the woodsman, the tricks of the trapper, all the delicate art of the forest, were familiar to Cooper from his youth up, just as the eery legends of North Britain and the stirring ballads of the Border had been absorbed by Walter Scott.

Franklin never had the chance of a college education; Irving was fitted for Columbia, but did not enter; Cooper entered Yale, but did not graduate — and the fault was his own. It was thought that the sea would cure his tendency to frolic. The Naval Academy had not then been established, and the customary training for a career on a man-of-war was to gain experience in the merchant marine. So in the fall of 1806, when Cooper was seventeen, he sailed on a merchant vessel for a year's cruise, shipping before the mast, and seeing not a little hard service. Soon after his return he received a commission as a midshipman in the regular navy.

It was a time of peace, although the war with Great Britain already was foreseen. In 1808 Cooper was one of a party sent to Oswego, on Lake Ontario, to build a sixteen-gun brig. In 1809 he was left for a while in command of the gunboats on Lake Champlain. In the same year he was attached to the "Wasp," then commanded by Lawrence—the Lawrence who was soon to command the "Chesapeake" in the action with the "Shannon," and who was to die with the immortal phrase on his lips, "Don't give up the ship!" Although Cooper saw no fighting during the three years and a half in which he wore the uniform of his country, he greatly increased his store of experience, adding to his knowledge of life before the mast on a merchant vessel an understanding of life on the quarter-deck of a man-of-war, besides gaining acquaintance with the Great Lakes.

In January, 1811, Cooper married Miss De Lancey, with whom he was to live happily for more than forty years. Apparently at the request of his bride, he resigned from the navy in May. He dwelt at Mamaroneck in Westchester county, New York, for several years, at first with his wife's father, and then in a hired house. In 1817, after a three years' stay in Cooperstown, he went back to Westchester, the home of his wife's childhood, and there he remained for five years. Seemingly content with the simple life of a well-to-do country gentleman, Cooper reached the age of thirty without any attempt at authorship—without even the hankering after pen and ink which is the characteristic of most predestined authors. The novelist flowers late; Scott was forty-three when his first novel, "Waverley" was published; and Hawthorne was forty-six when the "Scarlet Letter" appeared; but they had been writing from their boyhood.

Cooper's entry into authorship was almost accidental. Reading some cheap British novel, he was seized with the idea that he could do as well himself; and the result was his first book, "Precaution," published late in 1820. "Precaution" was an imitation of the average British novel of that time; it had merit equal to that of most of its models; it was a tale of life in England, and there was nothing to show that its author was not an Englishman. Indeed, when the book was republished in London, it was reviewed with no suspicion of its American authorship.

That Cooper, a most loyal and ardent American, should write a second-hand story of this sort, shows how complete was the colonial dependence of the United States on Great Britain in the first quarter of the nineteenth century — so far at least as letters were concerned. American literature did not exist. No one had yet declared that the one thing out of which an American literature could be made was American life. When Cooper's "Precaution" was written, Irving's "Sketch Book" was being published in parts; it was still incomplete, and half of the sketches in the book were from English subjects.

Yet it seems to have struck Cooper that if he did not fail with a novel describing British life, of which he knew little, he might succeed with a novel describing American life, of which he knew much. "Waverley" had been published in 1814, and in the next six years had appeared eight others of the "Scotch novels," as they were called; and in the very year of Cooper's first book, Scott had crossed the Border and produced in "Ivanhoe" really the first English historical novel, applying the method of the anonymous Scotch stories to an English theme. Cooper perceived that the same method could be applied to an American historical theme; and in the "Spy," which

Dear Sir

I shall be in Town the last of this week or the beginning of the next and will call on you immediately. - I have enquired of those you several times since your return in you must have heard that have not been able to find you at home. - I write this to let you know that I have not forgotten you and should have written before but thought I should be able to go to Town before then -

Yours Resp^t -

James Cooper

Decr 24th - Sat. 7 - 1820

L. Brackish Esq -

was published in 1821, he gave us the first American historical novel.

The "Spy" is a story of the Revolution, and its scene is laid in the Westchester which Cooper knew so well, and which had been a neutral ground, harried in turn by the British and the Americans: the "Cowboys" and the "Skinners." The time and the place were well chosen, and they almost sufficed of themselves to lend romance to any adventures the author might describe; and even better chosen was the central figure, Harvey Birch, one of the most interesting and effective of romantic characters. To the Spy himself, mysterious but winning, was chiefly due the instant success—and the success of the story was extraordinary, not only in the United States at first, and a few months later in Great Britain, but on the continent of Europe. It was translated into French by the translator of the Waverley novels; and it was afterward rendered into most of the modern languages in turn.

Encouraged by the plaudits of the public on both sides of the Atlantic, Cooper wrote another story, the "Pioneers," published in 1823. As the "Spy" was the first American historical novel, so was the "Pioneers" the first attempt to put into fiction what is perhaps as worthy of record as anything in American history—the life on the frontier and the character of the backwoodsman. Here Cooper was on firm ground; and although he did not fully realize the opportunity before him, his book was a revelation to the rest of the world. In it appeared for the first time one of the very greatest characters in fiction, the old woodsman, Natty Bumppo—the Leatherstocking who was to give his name to the series of tales which to-day is Cooper's best monument. In this first book we have but a faint sketch of the character the author afterward worked out with loving care. Rarely is there a successful sequel to a successful novel, but Cooper returned to Leatherstocking again and again, until the history of his adventures was complete in five independent tales, the composition of which extended over eighteen years.

Leaving for the moment Cooper's other writings, it may be well to note here that the "Pioneers" was followed in 1826 and 1827 by the "Last of the Mohicans" and the "Prairie," and in 1840 and 1841 by the "Pathfinder" and the "Deerslayer." This was the order in which they were written, but very different is the order in which they are to be read when we wish to follow the career of Natty Bumppo from the days of his youth, and to trace the development of his noble and captivating character. The latest written is the earliest to be read in the sequence of events; after the "Deerslayer" comes the "Last of the Mohicans," followed by the "Pathfinder" and then the "Pioneers," until in the "Prairie" the series ends with the death of Leatherstocking. The five tales vary in value, no doubt, but taken altogether they reveal a marvelous gift of narration, and an extraordinary fullness of invention. Merely as stories their interest is unfailing, while they are ennobled by the character of Natty.

Even before the publication of the "Pioneers," in which he introduced the American Indian into fiction, Cooper planned another story which was as daring a novelty. In 1821, the author of the Waverley novels, then unascertained, published the "Pirate." In Cooper's presence, the argument was advanced that Scott could not be the unknown author, since he was a lawyer, and this story revealed a knowledge of the ocean such as no landsman could have. Cooper, who had followed the sea himself, maintained that the "Pirate" showed that its author was not a sailor, since far greater effects could have been got out of the same materials if the writer had been a seafarer by profession. To prove his point, Cooper determined to write a sea story. Sailors there had been in fiction before, but no novel the scene of which was laid on the ocean; and Cooper's friends tried to convince him that the public at large could not be interested in a life so technical as the seaman's.

But Cooper persevered, and in 1823 he published the "Pilot," the first salt-water novel ever written, and to this day one of the very best. Its nameless and mysterious hero was a marine Harvey Birch; obviously he had been modeled upon the Paul Jones whose name is held in terror to this day on the British coasts he harassed. In Long Tom Coffin, the Nantucket whaler, Cooper created the only one of his other characters worthy to take place beside Leatherstocking; and Tom, like Natty, is simple, homely, and strong. In writing the "Pilot," Cooper evidently had in mind the friends who thought it impossible to interest the general reader in a tale of the ocean, and he laid some of his scenes on land; but it is these very passages which are tedious to-day, while the scenes at sea keep their freshness and have still unfailing interest.

In his second sea tale, the "Red Rover," published in 1829, Cooper avoided this blunder; after the story is fairly started the action passes continuously on the water, and the interest is therefore unbroken. The "Red Rover" may be said to be wholly a tale of the ocean, as the "Last of the Mohicans" is wholly a tale of the forest. Whether he was on the green billows or under the green trees, Cooper was completely at home; he drew from his own experience; he told what he had seen, what he knew. He wrote ten sea tales in all, of which the "Two Admirals" and "Wing-and-Wing," both published in 1842, are the best after the "Pilot" and the "Red Rover." In 1839 he sent forth his "History of the United States Navy," to this day an accepted authority for the period of which it treats.

It is by the "Spy," by the five "Leatherstocking Tales," and by the four or five foremost of the "Sea Tales" that Cooper's fame must be maintained. But he wrote many other novels, most of them of little importance. Some of them, like the "Wept of Wish-ton-wish," were American in subject; and some were European, like the "Bravo" and the "Headsman." These last were the result of a long visit Cooper paid to Europe, extending from 1826 to 1833. In Paris he had the pleasure of meeting Scott; and in Paris also he had the pleasure of defending his country against ignorant insults.

There is no need now to deny that Cooper seems to have enjoyed a dispute, and that he never went out of his way to avoid a quarrel. After he returned to the United States he became involved in numberless arguments of all sorts, personal, journalistic, literary, historical. He was frank, opinionated, and absolutely certain that he always had right on his side. Sure of his ground, he bore himself bravely and battled stanchly to repel any attacks he had invited.

His private life was most fortunate. His home was happy, and his wife and children were devoted to him. He had many friends; and his best friends were the best citizens of New York. When he moved to that city, in 1822, he founded a club, called sometimes after him, but more generally the "Bread and Cheese Lunch." To this club belonged Chancellor Kent; the poets Fitz-Greene Halleck and William Cullen Bryant; S. F. B. Morse, the inventor of the telegraph; and other representatives of the arts, the sciences, and the learned professions. Before Cooper went to Europe in 1826 these friends gave him a public dinner, at which Chancellor Kent presided and at which De Witt Clinton, the governor of the State, Winfield Scott, the head of the army, and Charles King, the future president of Columbia College, were present. After his return from Europe in 1833, the same group of distinguished men tendered to him another banquet, which he declined.

Nearly a score of years after, when he was sixty years old, and when he had lived through the storm of abuse which he had injudiciously aroused, his friends again made ready to give him a public testimonial of their regard; but before the arrangements were perfected he died. He had retired to Cooperstown years before, and there with his family he had been happy, superintending work on his farm, and writing when he chose. His death took place on September 14, 1851, at Cooperstown, to which he had been taken as an infant three score years before. Had he lived another day, he would have completed his sixty-second year. His wife outlived him less than five months.

A few days after his death a meeting of prominent men was held, over which Washington Irving presided, and as a result of this, William Cullen Bryant was asked to deliver a discourse on the life and writings of Cooper. This oration, spoken early in the next year, remained the best account of the novelist until the admirable biography in the American Men of Letters series appeared in 1882.

A consideration of Cooper's place in English literature involves a comparison with Scott. In the first place, the Scotchman was the earlier of the two; it was he who widened the field of the romance; it was he who pushed the novel to the front and made fiction the successful rival of poetry and the drama; it was he who showed all men how an historical novel might be written. Cooper is the foremost of Scott's followers, no doubt, and in skill of narration, in the story-telling faculty, in the gift of imparting interest to the incidents of a tale, Cooper at his best is not inferior to Scott at his best. But Scott had a more abundant humor and a wider insight into human nature.

Like Scott, Cooper was a writer of romance; that is to say, he was an optimist, an idealizer — one who seeks to see only the best, and who refuses to see what is bad. Scott chose to present only the bright side of chivalry, and to make the Middle Ages far pleasanter than they could have been in reality. Probably Scott knew that the picture he gave of England under Richard the Lion-Hearted was misleading; certainly he knew that he was not telling the whole truth. Cooper's red Indians are quite as real as Scott's black knights, to say the least. Cooper's Indians are true to life, absolutely true to life — so far as they go. Cooper told the truth about them — but he did not tell the whole truth. Sometimes he put forward the exception as the type; and sometimes he neglected some of the red man's ugliest traits. Cooper told us that the Indian is cruel as Scott told us that a tournament was often fatal; but he did not convey to us any realization of the ingrained barbarity and cruelty which was perhaps the chief characteristic of the Indian warrior. This side of the red man is kept in the shadow, while his bravery, his manliness, his skill, his many noble qualities, are dwelt on at length.

Time may be trusted safely to make a final selection from any author's works, however voluminous they may be, or however unequal. Cooper died almost exactly in the middle of the nineteenth century; and already it is the "Spy" and the "Leatherstocking Tales" and four or five of the "Sea Tales" which survive, because they deserve to survive, because they were at once new and true when they were written, because they remain to-day the best of their kind. Cooper's men of the sea, and his men of the forest and the plain, are alive now, though other fashions in fiction have come and gone. Other novelists have a more finished art nowadays, but no one of them all succeeds more completely in doing what he tried to do than did Cooper at his best. And he did a great service to American literature by showing how fit for fiction were the scenes, the characters, and the history of his native land.

QUESTIONS.—Tell the story of Cooper's early life and training on land and on sea. What changes in his way of living followed upon his marriage?

What circumstances attending upon Cooper's entrance upon a literary career show the dependent position of American literature?

Describe the first American historical novel.

Describe the series of fictions of which Natty Bumppo is the hero.

Declare the circumstances under which the first sea tale was written.

Compare Cooper's relations with the general public with his associations in private life.

Compare Cooper with Scott.

What were Cooper's great services to literature?

NOTE.—There are many editions of Cooper's stories. The best is that containing introductions by his daughter (Houghton Mifflin, 32 vols.).

The chief biography is that of T. R. Lounsbury in the American Men of Letters series (Houghton Mifflin).

For criticism, see Bryant's Oration; Lowell's "Fable for Critics" (Houghton Mifflin); Thackeray's "On a Peal of Bells"; Parkman's essay in North American Review (vol. 74, p. 147); Mark Twain's "Cooper's Literary Offences"; W. C. Brownell's essay in "American Prose Masters" (Scribner); and Brander Matthews's address at the Cooperstown centenary in "Gateways to Literature" (Scribner). For a discussion of "Colonialism in the United States," see H. C. Lodge's "Studies in History" (Houghton Mifflin).

VI WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT

WASHINGTON IRVING and James Fenimore Cooper were New Yorkers both by descent and by residence, but William Cullen Bryant, who lived at the same time, though a New Yorker by residence, was of the purest New England descent. Like Benjamin Franklin, the forerunner of Irving and Cooper, Bryant left the town of his birth to become the foremost citizen of a great city. He was born in the village of Cummington, in western Massachusetts, November 3, 1794, so he was eleven years younger than Irving and five years younger than Cooper. He survived Irving nearly twenty years, and died in New York in 1878. When he first saw the light, the United States were only fifteen in number, and Washington, the first President, was still at the head of the little nation. He survived to see the celebration of the hundred years of our independence, and the admission of the thirty-eighth state.

That he should have lived to the age of eighty-three is the more remarkable, as he had a feeble frame and no great stock of strength. As a young child he was "puny and very delicate in body, and of a delicate nervous organization." From the beginning he was forced to save himself in every way, and to order his life regularly.

His father was a country doctor; and his mother was descended from John Alden and his wife Priscilla, whose courtship has been told in verse by Longfellow, another of their descendants. Bryant learned Latin from Vergil's "Aeneid" and Greek from the Greek Testament. He began to make verses very early, and when scarce ten years old, so one of his biographers tells us, he "received a ninepenny coin from his grandfather for a rimed version of the first chapter of the book of Job." Even when he was but a little boy he wished to be a poet.

In the fall of 1810, Bryant, then not quite sixteen, entered the sophomore class at Williams College. At the end of the collegiate year he asked for and received an honorable dismissal from Williams, intending to enter the junior class at Yale. But his father could not afford to support him at New Haven, and to his lasting regret the poet was deprived of the profit of a full college course. He began the study of law; and to law his attention was given for more than ten years: He did not like the law, and he gave it up at the first opportunity; but while it was his calling he did his work loyally and thoroughly.

The North American Review was founded in 1815 by a little group of Bostonians, of whom Richard Henry Dana was one; it was an imitation of the British reviews of that time. To this periodical certain of Bryant's poems were sent; and when one of these was read aloud at a meeting of the editors, Dana smiled and said, "You have been imposed upon. No one on this side of the Atlantic is capable of writing such verse."

When they had assured themselves that they had not been imposed upon, the editors published two of the poems in the North American Review for September, 1817. One was called "Thanatopsis," and it had been composed six years before, when the poet was not yet eighteen. It was, as a critic has well said, "not only the finest poem which had been produced on this continent, but one of the most remarkable poems ever produced at such an early age." After its original appearance in print, the author revised it and improved it; but from the first it was seen to be among the foremost moral poems of our language. Though the poet might afterward equal it, he could never surpass it. In the same number of the Review appeared also his verses now known as "Inscription for the Entrance to a Wood." In 1818 the Review published Bryant's "Lines to a Waterfowl." Thereafter there was no doubt that the English language had gained a new poet.

He was married in 1820; and two years later he was invited to deliver, at Harvard, the Phi Beta Kappa poem, which pleased its hearers so much that he yielded to their requests, and gathered his scattered verses into a little volume. This earlier poetry of Bryant's has for us a double interest, that due to its own merit, which is undoubted, and that due to its influence upon other native poets in opening their eyes to the life about them. In this prosperous twentieth century it is very hard for us to understand how completely American authors depended upon Great Britain in the first quarter of the century. Not only was everything judged by British standards—everything was seen through British spectacles.

Bryant saw clearly that the flowers and the birds of New England were not those of old England; and later American poets have profited by his resolute use of nature as it is here in the United States. After Bryant's first volume of poems appeared, the nightingale became as silent in American verse as it had always been in American woods. He always kept close watch on nature: when only twelve years old, he wrote verses about the eclipse of 1806. "Thanatopsis" is imbued with a spirit of loving tenderness toward nature. The "Yellow Violet," written in 1814, is probably the first poem devoted to an actual American flower; and it reveals anew the poet's ability to see for himself what no poet had noted before, as in the final line of this stanza, for example:—

Thy parent sun, who bade thee view
Pale skies, and chilling moisture sip,
Has bathed thee in his own bright hue,
And streaked with jet thy glowing lip.

In 1825 Bryant gave up the law finally, resolved to earn his living by his pen. He removed to New York, where he was to reside for the next half century. He was appointed editor of the New York Review, to which he contributed many poems, among them that beginning:—

The melancholy days are come, the saddest of the year.

The Review did not prosper; but before it died Bryant had become an editorial writer on the Evening Post, and in

To live, that when they summoned come to join
The innumerable caravan which moved,
To that mysterious realm where each shall take
His chamber in the silent halls of Death,
Then go not, like the quarry-slave at night,
Scourged to his dungeon, but sustained and soothed,
By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave
Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him and lies down to pleasant dreams.

William Cullen Bryant.

1829, when the editor in chief of the Evening Post died, Bryant was promoted to his place. He already owned one eighth of the paper, and he was now enabled to increase his holding to one half. This share he retained to his death, and it became increasingly profitable as the years went by.

Bryant gave up law for journalism at a time when there was still an old-fashioned primness among literary people: it was a time when the law was commonly personified as "Themis," when authors were called the "literati," when writing verses was termed "toying with the Muses," and when there were not a few other affectations. New York, already marked as the business metropolis of the country, was also the literary center of the Union when Bryant moved to it. And by the authors and artists of New York Bryant was made welcome. He lectured before the newly organized National Academy of Design, and he became a member of the Cooper Club, better known as the "Bread and Cheese Lunch."

Although American literature had thus begun, it was still in its infancy. The reading public was very small, and the magazines were few and struggling. One could hardly earn a living as a man of letters; to support a family by literature was impossible. Irving was a bachelor, and Cooper had means of his own. Besides, literature at best is better as a staff than it is as a crutch. There is no doubt, therefore, that Bryant did well in relying on journalism for his bread, although he might hope now and again to pay for his butter by literature. The editor, like the author, earns his living by his pen, yet there is little or no other likeness between them. The author says once for all what he has to say, and he says it as best he can; while the journalist, if he says anything once, must repeat it again and again, since that is his chief method of producing his effect. Then, again, the author tries to find subjects of eternal interest, ever fresh and never stale; while the journalist is condemned to the perpetual discussion of timely topics of present importance. Perhaps it is not too much to suggest that the habit of journalism tends to unfit a man for literature.

In journalism, as in authorship, character tells for as much as ability; and upon the newspaper he conducted Bryant imposed his own lofty ideals. He held fast to his principles, even when they forced him to leave the political party with which he had hitherto been acting. But although as a journalist Bryant took high ground and defended it firmly, he was never carried away by the fury of partisan discussion. In his editorial writings, as in his poetry, the tone is full of dignity. Calm in his strength, he was both temperate in expressing his opinions and good-tempered. He fought fairly and he respected his adversary. He was never a snarling critic either of men or of measures. He elevated the level of the American newspaper, but it was by his practice, not by his preaching. He was choice in his own use of language, and there was in the office of the Evening Post a list of words and phrases not permitted in its pages.

The editorial articles which Bryant wrote for his paper day by day for more than fifty years have never been collected, and of course they never will be, though they are a history of the United States during the half century which no student of the times can afford to neglect. The letters written to the Evening Post, when he was on his travels, have many of them been reprinted. In 1850 he gathered the best of them into a volume, as the "Letters of a Traveler"; and in 1869 he made a second collection called "Letters from the East." The interest of these two books is due rather to their author than to their own merits; he lacked the ease, the lightness, the familiarity which are to be found in the letters of the ideal traveler. He was a poet; and his best work was in verse, not in prose.

Bryant was also a public speaker. Upon a score of solemn occasions the poet was the orator of the day; and these addresses are preserved in a volume of the collected edition of his works. At the death of Cooper, Bryant was invited to deliver a memorial oration, in which he paid to his departed friend the full measure of laudation, not over-praising, but carefully criticizing, and setting the fame of the novelist upon firm foundations. More than once he was the speaker on great civic occasions when the citizens of New York needed a mouthpiece. Yet he was not a born orator; he lacked the physical strength, the sweep of gesture, the persuasive voice, the contagious enthusiasm, the kindling fire, which make up the gift of eloquence. His addresses were always written out carefully; they were always prepared with a full appreciation of the demands of the occasion, and with a full understanding of his own limitations; they were always stately and impressive, yet were never stiff or labored.

The fame of the orator, and of the traveler, and of the journalist, perishes swiftly, while that of the poet endures. Bryant did not allow his duty to his newspaper wholly to absorb his time. To poetry he was devoted his whole life long, although the body of his verse is not great. In 1831 he published a volume of his poetry containing four score more poems than had appeared in the collection of ten years before. More than thirty years later, in 1863, he issued what may be called the second volume of his verse, to which he gave the simple title of "Thirty Poems." Among these later poems were the defiant refrain of "Not Yet," and the resolute stanzas, "Our Country's Call," written in the dark days at the outbreak of the Rebellion and nobly eulogized in Lowell's "On Board the Seventy-Six." His later verses were added in successive editions of his complete poems.

In the course of his travels and of his studies he had made himself familiar with French and German, Spanish and Italian, while he had deepened his knowledge of Greek and Latin. In the fall of 1863 he translated the fifth book of the "Odyssey." Encouraged by the way in which it was received, he turned to the "Iliad" and began to translate passages of that. In the summer of 1866 his wife died, and the poet felt her loss keenly; it unfitted him for severe work, and yet made it advisable that he should keep occupied. He again turned to Homer; and in 1870 he published his complete translation of the "Iliad," following it two years later with a version of the "Odyssey." Bryant was successful in giving the impression of ease and of elevation, and his version of Homer has generally been accepted as among the best of the many recent metrical translations.

Bryant had long passed three score years and ten when he finished his task of turning the great Greek poem into English verse. He was hale in his old age, exercising regularly, eating sparingly, taking great care of himself, and retaining full possession of his powers. At the age of eighty-four he delivered an address in Central Park at the unveiling of the bust of Mazzini, the Italian patriot. The day was hot, and he spoke with slight shelter from the sun. After the ceremony he walked across the Park to a friend's house, but as he mounted the steps he fell back suddenly. He was taken to his own home, where he lingered for a fortnight, dying June 12, 1878.

Bryant's place in the history of American literature is easy to declare: he was a pioneer and leader. He was the earliest poet of nature as it is here in the United States, seeing it freshly for himself and not repeating at second hand what British poets had been saying about nature as it is in the British Isles. The love he bore to nature was almost a passion, like the love he had for his country. His verse is stately and reserved, sometimes perilously near to frigidity. Yet there is a lyric swing in the "Song of Marion's Men" and a singing quality to the "Planting of the Apple Tree."

Bryant's Home, Roslyn, L.I.

It is not fair to suggest that Bryant's muse always sits lonely on a chill and lofty peak. No doubt there is often an absence of warmth — due perhaps to the constant self-control which had become second nature. Bryant likened George Washington to the frozen Hudson flowing full and mighty beneath its shield of ice; and one could fairly apply the figure to the poet himself. There is a stern and determined vigor in certain of his stanzas that Washington might have enjoyed. Take the famous quatrain from the "Battle-Field," for example, —

Truth crushed to earth shall rise again :
The eternal years of God are hers ;
But Error, wounded, writhes in pain
And dies among his worshippers.

His hatred of shams and gauds kept his verse simple and clear — undefiled by jingling conceits or petty prettinesses; it is sustained nearly always at the same high level. Although his best poems are not many, he wrote surprisingly little that fell below his average. It is said that an old young man makes a young old man. Certainly the saying was true of Bryant as a poet: he was mature very early in life and he kept his freshness to the end. "Thanatopsis" was written when he was young, and the "Flood of Years" when he was old; and a comparison shows that there has been no growth: the thought is as deep in the first poem as in the second, and the expression is as free and as noble.

QUESTIONS. — Discuss briefly: (1) Bryant's early acquaintance with verse; (2) his career as a student.

Comment upon Bryant's first four important poems. What double interest have these poems for us?

What is to be said for and against journalism as a calling for a person of literary tastes? What was Bryant's ideal in journalism?

What portion of his journalistic writing did he care to preserve?

What is to be said of Bryant as a public speaker?

What is Bryant's place in the history of American literature?

What is one criticism most likely to be made upon Bryant's poetry? And what can be said in answer to this criticism?

NOTE.—The only complete edition of Bryant's works is that published by Appleton (4 vols.), who also issue the "Poems" alone (Household edition and Cabinet edition). "Sella," with "Thanatopsis" and other poems, are included in one number of the Riverside Literature series (Houghton Mifflin).

There are biographies by Parke Godwin (Appleton, 2 vols.), and by John Bigelow in American Men of Letters series (Houghton Mifflin).

For criticism, see Lowell's "Fable for Critics" (Houghton Mifflin); E. C. Stedman's "Poets of America" (Houghton Mifflin); and W. E. Leonard in the "Cambridge History of American Literature" (Putnam).

VII EDGAR ALLAN POE

WITH scarcely an exception the chief authors of America have lived out their allotted threescore years and ten ; and their long lives have been happy ; and at last they have died surrounded by friends and held in high honor by their fellow-countrymen. Franklin and Irving, Bryant and Emerson, Longfellow and Lowell, Holmes and Whittier, all survived to a ripe old age. James Fenimore Cooper, although often harassed by petty squabbles due to his own touchiness of temper, was completely happy at his own fireside ; and Nathaniel Hawthorne, although so much of a recluse by nature as to seem to some almost a misanthrope, was quite as fortunate in his home life as Cooper was.

The single exception to this remarkable record of prosperous and honorable longevity is Edgar Allan Poe, who died young and alone and poor and in ill repute. And yet in the eyes of foreigners he is the most gifted of all the authors of America; he is the one to whom the critics of Europe would most readily accord the full title of genius. At the beginning of the twentieth century Poe is the sole man of letters born in the United States whose writings are read eagerly in Great Britain and in France, in Germany, in Italy, and in Spain, where Franklin is now but a name and where the fame of James Fenimore Cooper, once as widely spread, is now slowly fading away.

And in yet another respect is Poe unlike the other American authors of this century; they may be divided into two geographical groups — Irving, Cooper, and Bryant in New York; and Emerson, Longfellow, Hawthorne, Whittier, Holmes, and Lowell in New England. Poe was neither a New Yorker nor a New Englander; he was a Southerner both by temperament and by descent.

That he chanced to be born in Boston — on January 19, 1809 — was an accident due to the fact that his parents happened to be attached to a theatrical company then performing there. His father was a son of David Poe, a revolutionary patriot of Baltimore. His mother was an actress of much skill and of high character. After the death of his father his mother joined the company in Richmond; and there she died also, before Edgar was three years old.

He was a beautiful and precocious child; and the wife of a Richmond merchant named Allan received him into the family. The boy was thereafter called Edgar Allan Poe. His parents had been very poor; and he was now on the footing of an adopted son in the household of a liberal man who was well-to-do. He was sent to school, and at the age of six he could read and draw and dance. "It is related also," says a biographer, "that Mr. Allan taught the boy to stand up in a chair at dessert and pledge the health of the company, which he did with roguish grace," and which may have implanted in him then the seeds of a fatal desire for strong drink.

In 1815 the Allans went to England and Edgar was put to school in the outskirts of London, where he took part in outdoor sports and studied Latin and French. Five years later, when the boy was eleven, the family returned to Richmond and he was again sent to a good school. He began to write verses; he led in the school debates and in the school athletics; but he made no intimate friends. Even as a boy he seems to have been self-willed, "proud of his powers and fond of their successful display." One of his schoolboy feats at the age of sixteen was to swim from Richmond to Warwick, a distance of five or six miles. After he left school he studied for a while under excellent tutors; and then at the age of seventeen he matriculated at the University of Virginia, where he remained a little longer than a year.

His scholarship was praised while he was there, and he was on good terms with the authorities. But his character was declaring itself; he was sometimes solitary and reserved; and sometimes he drank to excess and played cards beyond his means. At the close of the session Mr. Allan refused to pay these gambling debts and took Poe away from the university, giving him a desk in the counting room at Richmond. Perhaps Poe felt himself unfitted for business, and perhaps its restraints were irksome. At all events he soon broke away finally.

In May, 1827 — being again in Boston — he enlisted in the United States Army, under the name of Edgar A. Perry, giving his age as twenty-two (when he was really only eighteen). He served in the artillery for nearly two years, first in the harbor of Boston, then at Fort Moultrie near Charleston, and finally at Fortress Monroe. He seems to have discharged his duties to the satisfaction of his officers, and he was even promoted to be Sergeant Major. After the death of Mrs. Allan, he was reconciled with her husband, who procured Edgar's honorable discharge from the army and afterwards got him an appointment as a cadet at West Point.

He entered the Military Academy in July, 1830, being then twenty-one but declaring himself to be only nineteen. He was shy and reserved with his fellow-cadets. His French was fluent and he had an aptitude for mathematics, so that the hard work of the education the government gives its officers was easy for him. But he showed a gross contempt for his military duties; and probably the service was not alluring to him.

Shortly after he entered West Point Mr. Allan married again; and Poe knew that he could no longer hope to inherit any portion of that gentleman's fortune. Having the ample confidence of youthful ability, he resolved to face the world for himself. By absence from roll call and guard duty and by disobedience to the orders of the officer of the day, he made certain his dismissal after trial by court-martial. And in March, 1831, being then twenty-two years old, he left West Point to begin the battle of life alone.

He had arranged with his fellow-cadets to subscribe for a volume of his poetry. Already in Boston in 1827 he had published a thin little book containing "Tamerlane and Other Poems," not more immature than juvenile verses usually are. Two years later in Baltimore he had published what was really an enlargement of this first venture, "Al Aaraaf, Tamerlane, and Minor Poems." The collection published in New York in 1831 contained revised versions of these earlier metrical essays, with the addition of his later verses; it was called simply "Poems" and it was dedicated to the cadets of the Military Academy. Although Poe probably made a little money by the subscriptions to this book, it failed to make any deep impression on the public.

The next four years were for Poe a period of hard struggle and bitter poverty. He began to write short-stories; and one of these, a tale of striking vigor and novelty, the "MS. found in a Bottle," won him a hundred-dollar prize offered by a newspaper for the best brief fiction sent to it. But he could not find a publisher willing to issue the volume of tales of which this was one. There were times when he was in want of the absolute necessities of life — when he was insufficiently clothed and when he lacked food itself. But he had friends who encouraged him and helped him in many ways.

At last, in 1835, one of these friends got him the post of assistant editor of the Southern Literary Messenger, a new monthly review just started in Richmond. For a position of this character he immediately showed himself to be remarkably well fitted; and under his control the Messenger promptly became the leading literary periodical of the South. Poe printed in it his own poems and short-stories, and thus began to make himself known as an imaginative writer of strange originality and power. As a critic also he revealed unexpected strength; he had fixed principles of literary art and he applied these principles fairly and fearlessly to the writings of the time. Indeed, in this earlier part of Poe's career as an author he was known rather as a critic than as a poet or as a romancer.

Having an assured income from the Southern Literary Messenger sufficient for his support, he married his cousin, Virginia Clemm. This was in May, 1836, and he was then twenty-seven years old; the bride was barely fourteen. He made a tender and a devoted husband. The future now seemed bright before him: he had a loving wife and loyal friends; he had a comfortable home and congenial work; he was rapidly making himself known as an author from whom much might be expected. Then suddenly he let his fortune slip through his hands; he yielded again to the temptation of drink; and a few months after his marriage he lost his place on the Messenger.

The record of the thirteen remaining years of Poe's life is one long sequence of similar opportunities wasted in like manner. He had many friends always willing to help him along; and his ability as an editor was indisputable. But whatever the position he undertook to fill, and however firmly he might set about his duties, the fatal weakness always reappeared sooner or later. As the years passed over him, the temptation became more and more difficult to resist. When he was sober he was hard working, faithful to his duties, and courteous to all. But toward the end of his life the periods of sobriety were briefer, as his will was enfeebled by constant yielding.

After leaving Richmond Poe published, in 1838, the "Narrative of Arthur Gordon Pym," a fictitious story of Antarctic adventure, made real by the constant description of unimportant detail, somewhat in the manner of "Robinson Crusoe."

In 1840 he succeeded in finding a publisher for the "Tales of the Grotesque and the Arabesque," the most original collection of short-stories written by any American author, with the sole exception of the volume of "Twice-Told Tales" which Hawthorne had sent forth from his obscurity three years before. It is to be recorded that Poe was one of the first to recognize the genius of Hawthorne. The story-teller of the South swiftly discovered in the romancer of the North certain of the rare qualities which he knew himself to possess and which he ardently admired — invention, and imagination, and a mastery of the weird and the mysterious.

While there was in the "Tales of the Grotesque and the Arabesque" a certain Southern affluence and luxuriance, and in the "Twice-Told Tales" a certain Northern severity and restraint, both authors showed in these books that they had not only the native gift of story-telling but also that they had acquired the art of narrative. Any tale of theirs, twice-told, or grotesque and arabesque, had always unity of conception, adroit perspective, and just proportion.

Perhaps the knowledge that Hawthorne had had a post in the Boston customhouse suggested to Poe that he should also try to secure a place in the government service. This was during his six years' residence in Philadelphia after he left Richmond. He failed to get the appointment he sought. But fortune favored him again and again, and he had other places. He acted as editor of one magazine after another, always increasing its circulation by his skill and his activity, and always losing his position at last either because he quarreled with the proprietor or because he lapsed again into his old habits and then neglected his duties. The fidelity with which Poe did his allotted work and the courtesy he showed toward

The Rationale of Verse. *

By EDGAR A. POE.

The word "Verse" is here used not in its strict or primitive sense, but as the term most convenient for expressing generally and without pedantry all that is involved in the consideration of rhythm, rhymes, metre, and versification.

There is, perhaps, no topic in polite literature which has been more pertinaciously discussed, and there is certainly not one about which so much inaccuracy, confusion, misconception, misrepresentation, mystification, and downright ignorance on all sides, can be fairly said to exist. Were the topic really difficult, or did it lie, even, in the cloud-land of metaphysics, where the doubt-vapors may be made to assume any and every shape at the will or at the fancy of the gazer, we should have less reason to wonder at all this contradiction and perplexity; but in fact the subject is exceedingly simple; one tenth of it, possibly, may be called ethical; nine tenths, however, appertain to the mathematics; and the whole is included within the limits of the commonest common sense.

"But, if this is the case, how," it will be asked, "can so much misunderstanding have arisen? Is it conceivable that a thousand profound scholars, investigating so very simple a matter for centuries, have not been able to place it in the fullest light, at least, of which it is susceptible?" These queries, I confess, are not easily answered:—at all events a satisfactory reply to them might cost more trouble than would, if properly considered, the whole rexata questio to which they have reference. Nevertheless, there is little difficulty or danger in suggesting that the "thousand profound scholars" may have failed, ^{been} his employers during the periods when he retained his self-control were in marked contrast with his characteristics when he had yielded to temptation, for then he was neglectful, touchy, and suspicious.

* Some passages of this article appeared, about four years ago, in "The Pioneer", a monthly Magazine published by J. R. Lowell and R. Carter. Although an excellent work it had a very limited circulation.

As a writer his reputation steadily rose during his stay in Philadelphia. In 1841 he published in a magazine the first detective-story ever written, the "Murders in the Rue Morgue"; and two years later he won another hundred-dollar prize with a second tale of the same type, the "Gold Bug." Two other stories of hidden secrets skillfully unraveled are his "Mystery of Marie Roget" and the "Purloined Letter." Just as Washington Irving had written the first American local short-story in "Rip Van Winkle," and just as James Fenimore Cooper had written the first sea tale in the "Pilot," so Poe in like manner invented the detective-story. He has had numberless imitators in this department of fiction; he has had no real rivals. In ingenuity, in variety, in plausibility, in sustained interest and in vigorous logic, the "Murders in the Rue Morgue" and the "Gold Bug" are unsurpassable masterpieces.

After a stay of six years in Philadelphia Poe moved in 1844 to New York, where his residence was for the few remaining years of his life. He had long cherished the hope of starting a monthly magazine of his own, but the project never came to anything, although it always remained the center of Poe's aspirations. He found editorial positions first on one and then on another literary journal in New York, breaking off his connection with them suddenly as was his custom.

His criticisms of his contemporaries were now far sharper than they had been when he first wrote; and they were less honest. As a critic Poe's influence had hitherto been excellent in the main, for he had a better equipment and a keener insight than any other newspaper reviewer of the time; and he had lofty ideals of literary art. But as he grew older his opinions seem to have narrowed. He had no reverence for Homer or Shakspeare or Milton; he regarded Keats and Shelley and Coleridge "and a few others of like expression . . . as the sole poets."

Having these one-sided views, he was often violent and intolerant in setting them forth. And he allowed his liking for the person of an author to influence his published opinion of that author's works. He praised his friends unduly; and he was bitter in his attack on those whom he held to be his enemies. Even the gentle Longfellow was unfairly held up to scorn as a poet who pilfered from many predecessors. One writer whose works he criticised sharply, retorted with an attack so personal that Poe brought suit for libel and recovered damages.

Yet at this time Poe's own reputation as a poet had just been established firmly by the publication of the "Raven" —perhaps the most widely known poem written by any American to this day. It appeared in a magazine early in 1845 and was instantly copied into the leading newspapers of the United States. It achieved an immediate popularity, which continues undiminished to the present time. Its reception was so cordial that toward the close of the year Poe gathered up his other verses, revising them scrupulously as was his wont, and sent forth a volume called the "Raven and Other Poems." Hitherto Poe had been known to the public as a critic chiefly, and also as a writer of short-stories; thereafter he was accepted as a poet.

In the preface to this collection of his verses, Poe declared that poetry had been to him "not a purpose, but a passion." By long study he had made himself a master of the technic of verse, and he combined with extraordinary skill all the effects to be derived from lilting rhythm, intricate rime, artful repetition, and an aptly chosen refrain. He bent words to his bidding, and he made his verse so melodious that it had almost the charm of music.

That his scheme of poetry was highly artificial, that the themes of his poems were vague and insubstantial, and that his stanzas do not stimulate thought — these things may be admitted without disadvantage. What the reader does find in Poe's poetry is the suggestion of departed but imperishable beauty, and the lingering grace and fascination of haunting melancholy. His verses throb with an inexpressible magic and glow with intangible fantasy. His poems have no other purpose; they convey no moral; they echo no call to duty; they celebrate beauty only — beauty immaterial and evanescent; they are their own excuse for being.

In 1846 he moved to a tiny little cottage at Fordham in the outskirts of New York. His wife was dying, and they were in bitter want. He lacked even bedclothes to wrap up the enfeebled woman he loved, and she lay in bed covered with his overcoat. Toward the end of the year a public appeal was made in the newspapers, stating that the family of the poet needed immediate help; and as a result, their necessities were promptly relieved. Poe's "natural pride impelled him to shrink from public charity even at the cost of truth in denying those necessities which were but too real." His wife sank lower and lower day by day, and early in 1847 she died. Poe himself was also ill; and again a subscription on his behalf was taken up in New York.

For a while he lived in retirement, slowly regaining his strength. It was about this time that he wrote the "Bells," one of the most sonorously melodious of his poems, second in popularity only to the "Raven." He also elaborated a pseudo-scientific rhapsody, which he called "Eureka." Before publishing this he delivered part of it as a lecture. He had appeared on the lecture platform more than once already in Philadelphia and in Boston. He was a picturesque and striking speaker; and it is not easy to see why he did not earlier turn his attention to lecturing as a means of pushing his fortunes.

Poe's Cottage, Fordham, N.Y.

Even before the death of his wife he seems to have allowed himself to be flattered by foolish women, whose now forgotten verses he belauded extravagantly. To one or another of these he went for sympathy, although apparently unable to decide definitely which of them he preferred. He was even engaged to be married to a lady in Providence, who had to break off the match because he did not keep his word to her to give up drink. Then he proposed to a lady in Richmond and, so it seems, was accepted.

Toward the end of September, two years after his wife's death, he left Richmond to arrange for his final removal from New York. Four or five days later he was found in Baltimore in the last stages of delirium. He was admitted to a hospital, and there, on Sunday, October 9, 1849, he died. His relatives took charge of his funeral and he was buried the next day.

Thus came to an untimely end the unfortunate genius who was born in the same year as Oliver Wendell Holmes, and who died miserably forty years and more before the close of Holmes's dignified and honorable career. He had great gifts, perhaps greater than those of any other American poet, but he knew not how to husband them. He had many chances, but he threw them away, one by one. Fortune favored him again and again, but he made shipwreck of his fate. He won many friends to no purpose, for their unwearied efforts were unavailing to save him from the consequences of his own weakness of will. His misfortunes were due to his own failings; and if he was unhappy, it was entirely his own fault. He was, as Lowell said in Poe's lifetime, "wholly lacking in that element of manhood which for want of a better name we call character; it is something quite distinct from genius — though all great geniuses are endowed with it."

QUESTIONS. — Enlarge upon two respects in which Poe is strikingly unlike the other great American writers of the nineteenth century.

Trace his career to his expulsion from West Point.

Compare Poe's literary ability, as it was revealed by his first important volume, with that of Hawthorne, as this was revealed in the latter's corresponding work.

Discuss Poe's success in a line of fiction in which he was the pioneer.

What changes in Poe's disposition and manner began to be evident after his removal to what was to be his home for the few remaining years of his life?

What characteristics of Poe's genius at about the same time opened for him a new literary career?

What were the chief events of the last three years of Poe's life?

How does Lowell's estimate of Poe's character agree with your own?

NOTE.—For complete editions of Poe's works, see Stedman and Woodberry (Scribner, 10 vols.) and J. A. Harrison (Crowell, 11 vols.). The most carefully annotated single volume edition of the "Poems" is that of Killis Campbell (Ginn).

The best biography is G. E. Woodberry's in the American Men of Letters series (Houghton Mifflin).

The best criticism of Poe is in Stedman's "Poets of America" (Houghton Mifflin). Note also the characterization of Poe in Lowell's "Fable for Critics" (Houghton Mifflin); in T. W. Higginson's "Short Studies of American Authors" (Longmans); in A. Lang's preface to his edition of Poe's poems (Mosher); and in W. C. Brownell's "American Prose Masters" (Scribner). Attention may also be called to Brander Matthews's essays, "Poe and the Detective Story" in "Inquiries and Opinions" (Scribner), and "Poe's Cosmopolitan Fame" in "Gateways to Literature" (Scribner).

VIII RALPH WALDO EMERSON

ALTHOUGH Franklin and Bryant were born in New England, they left it in early life — Franklin for Philadelphia, and Bryant for New York, where he found Irving and Cooper. The earliest of the leaders of American literature to be born in New England, to live there, and to die there, was Ralph Waldo Emerson.

He is the foremost representative of the powerful influence which New England has exerted on American life and on American literature. The fathers of Franklin and of Irving were newcomers ; the ancestors of Emerson had been settled in New England for five generations. They had been ministers of the gospel, one after another; and Emerson's grandfather belonged also to the church militant, urging on his parishioners to the fight at Concord Bridge in 1775, and dying in 1776 from a fever caught while on his way to join the troops at Ticonderoga.

Ralph Waldo Emerson was born May 25, 1803, in Boston, not far from the birthplace of Franklin. His father was a clergyman, who had recently founded what is now the library of the Boston Athenaeum. Books, rather than the usual boyish sports, were the delight of the son. He rarely played, and never owned a sled. In the austere New England life of the time there was little leisure for mere amusement.

Emerson's father died before the boy was eight years old, and thereafter the child had to help his mother, who took boarders and tried hard to give her sons an education such as their father's. Emerson entered the Latin School in 1813, and one day the next year, when there was a rumor that the British were going to send a fleet to Boston Harbor, he went with the rest of the boys to help build earthworks on one of the islands. About this time, also, he began to rime, celebrating in juvenile verse the victories of the young American navy.

In August, 1817, Emerson entered Harvard College, obtaining the appointment of "President's Freshman," a student who received his lodgings free in return for carrying official messages. He served also as waiter at the college commons, and so saved three fourths the cost of his board. Later in his college course he acted as tutor to younger pupils. He seems to have impressed his instructors as a youth of remarkable ability; but he was not a diligent student.

In those days Harvard was not a university ; it was not even a college ; it was little more than a high school where boys recited their lessons. Emerson was only eighteen when he was graduated, feeling that the regular course of studies had done little for him, and having therefore strayed out of the beaten path to browse for himself among the books in the library. He was popular with the best of his classmates, and at graduation he was class poet.

Whatever may have been the value of a college education in those days, Emerson was the earliest of the little group of the founders of American literature to go through college. Franklin, having to work for his living from early boyhood, had no time ; Irving, after preparing for Columbia, threw his chance away ; Cooper was expelled from Yale ; and Bryant was so dissatisfied with Williams that he left it after a single year. But the authors who came after Emerson made sure of the best education that this country could afford them. Hawthorne and Longfellow were graduated from Bowdoin, while from Emerson's college, Harvard, were to come Holmes and Lowell, Thoreau and Parkman.

When he graduated, Emerson's ambition was to be a professor of rhetoric ; but such a position was never offered to him. He taught school for a while in Boston, earning money to pay his debts and to help his mother. Then he entered the Divinity School at Harvard, and, in October, 1826, he was "approbated to preach," delivering his first sermon a few days later. For the sake of his health he spent that winter in Florida, at St. Augustine. On his return he lived chiefly in Cambridge, preaching here and there ; and in the spring of 1829 he became the minister of the old North Church in Boston. In September he married Miss Ellen Tucker, but he lost his wife soon after the marriage. Not long after, a change in his views as to religious rites and duties made him unwilling to remain in the ministry, and in 1832 he resigned his charge.

On Christmas day of that year he sailed for Europe in a small brig bound for Malta, whence he went over into Italy, and thence to France and Great Britain, and met the essayist Carlyle and the poets Wordsworth and Coleridge. With Carlyle Emerson formed a lasting friendship, which seems extraordinary, for few men were less akin in their manners or in their views of life. In low, clear tones the gentle American spoke to the soul of man, while the burly Scotch humorist was forever scolding and shrieking. Carlyle was proudly scornful and harshly indignant, while Emerson was kindly, tolerant, and forbearing; but different as were their attitudes, their aims were not so unlike, since Emerson loved good and Carlyle hated evil; and their friendship endured till death.

Toward the end of 1833 Emerson came back to America, pleased that in Europe he had met the men he most wished to see. A few months after his return he settled in Concord, to reside there for the rest of his life. In 1835 he married Miss Lidian Jackson, with whom he was to live happily for nearly half a century.

Emerson was now past thirty. He was not yet known as an author, and he did not look to authorship for his living; indeed, in the United States authorship could then give but a precarious livelihood. Besides, he preferred to teach by word of mouth. He still preached occasionally, and he lectured frequently. His earliest addresses seem to have been on scientific subjects, and he talked to his townsmen also about his travels in Europe, which was then distant at least a month's sail, and which few Americans could hope to visit. For many years he delivered in Boston, nearly every winter, long courses of lectures, not reported or printed, but containing much that the author repeated in the essays he was to publish afterward.

At last, in 1836, he put forth his first book, "Nature," and the next year he delivered an oration on "The American Scholar." Hitherto little had happened to him except the commonplaces of existence ; thereafter, though his life remained tranquil, he was known to the world at large. He was greeted as are all who declare a new doctrine ; welcomed by some, abused by many, misunderstood by most. Proclaiming the value of self-reliance, Emerson denounced man's slavery to his own worldly prosperity, and set forth at once the duty and the pleasure of the plain living which permits high thinking. "Why should you renounce your right to traverse the starlit deserts of truth," he asked, "for the premature comforts of an acre, house, and barn?"

Emerson's Residence, Concord Mass.

He asserted the virtue of manual labor. Looking bravely toward the future, he bade his hearers break the bonds of the past. He told them to study themselves, since all the real good or evil that can befall must come from themselves. At the heart of Emerson's doctrine there was always a sturdy and wholesome Americanism.

He was never self-assertive. He never put himself forward; and yet from that time on there was no denying his leadership of the intellectual advance of the United States. The most enlightened spirits of New England gathered about him; and he found himself in the center of the vague movement known as "Transcendentalism." For all their hardness, the New Englanders are an imaginative race; and Transcendentalism is but one of the waves of spiritual sentiment which have swept over them. Emerson himself had never a hint of eccentricity. His judgment was always sane and calm. He edited for a while the Dial, a magazine for which the Transcendentalists wrote, and which existed from 1840 to 1844. But he took no part in an experiment of communal life undertaken by a group of Transcendentalists at Brook Farm from 1841 to 1847. Among those who did join this community where all were to share in the labor of the field and of the household were Nathaniel Hawthorne and George William Curtis.

In 1841 Emerson published the first volume of his "Essays"; and he sent forth a second series in 1844. In his hands the essay returns almost to the form of Montaigne and Bacon; it is weighty and witty; but it is not so light as it was with Addison and Steele, with Goldsmith and Irving. He indulged in fancies sometimes, and he strove to take his readers by surprise, to startle them, and so to arouse them to the true view of life. Nearly all his essays had been lectures, and every paragraph had been tested by its effect upon an audience. Thus the weak phrases were discarded one by one, until at last every sentence, polished by wear, rounded to a perfect sphere, went to the mark with unerring certainty.

To Emerson an essay was rather a collection of single sayings than a harmonious whole. He was keen-eyed and clear-sighted enough to understand his own shortcomings, and he once said that every sentence of his was an "infinitely repellent particle." His thoughts did not form a glittering chain; they were not even loosely linked together. They lay side by side like unset gems in a box. Emerson was rather a poet with moments of insight than a systematic philosopher. The lack of structure in his essays was, in a measure, due also to the way they were written.

It was Emerson's practice to set down in his journal his detached thoughts as soon as they had taken shape. Whenever he had a lecture to prepare, he selected from his journal those sentences which seemed to bear on the subject of his discourse, adding whatever other illustrations or anecdotes suggested themselves to him at the moment. "In writing my thoughts," he declared, "I seek no order, or harmony, or results. I am not careful to see how they comport with other thoughts and other words—I trust them for that—any more than how any one minute of the year is related to any other remote minute which yet I know is so related. The thoughts and the minutes obey their own magnetisms, and will certainly reveal themselves in time."

Emerson's first volume of "Poems" was published in 1846. Ten years before he had written the hymn sung at the completion of the monument commemorating Concord fight:—

By the rude bridge that arched the flood,
Their flag to April's breeze unfurled,
Here once the embattled farmers stood,
And fired the shot heard round the world.

This is one of the best, and one of the best known, of the poems of American patriotism. But Emerson cared too little for form often to write so perfect a poem. The bonds of rime and meter irked him and he broke them willfully. Now and again he happened on a quatrain than which nothing can be more beautiful:—

Thou canst not wave thy staff in air,
Or dip thy paddle in the lake,
But it carves the bow of beauty there,
And the ripples in rimes the oar forsake.

Following Bryant, Emerson put into his verse nature as he saw it about him—the life of American woods and fields. No second-hand nightingale sang in his verses; he took pleasure in riming the "Humble-bee" and the "Titmouse," and in singing the streams and the hills of New England. Herein there was no lack of elevation. The spirit of the true poet Emerson had abundantly; indeed, there are those now who call him a poet rather than a philosopher. However careless his verse making—and it was sometimes very slovenly—the best of his stanzas are strong and bracing; they lift up the heart of man.

One of Emerson's poems most richly laden with emotion and experience is the "Threnody," which he wrote after the death of his first-born. He was a fond father; and his

The Ground-pines wash their rusty green,
The maple-tops their crimson tint,
On the soft path each track is clear,
The firs' foot leaves its weather print.
The pebble loosened from the rock
Asks of the uschin to be topped.

The flint & marble beats a heart,
The kind earth takes her children's part,

The green lane is the schoolboy's friend,
Low leaves his quarrel apprehend;
The fresh ground loves his top o' ball,
The air swings round to his call;
The brimming brook invites a leap,
He dives the hollow, climbs the steep,
The youth reads omen where he goes,
And spreads all language the rose,
The woodcock mocks with tiny noise,
The far halloo of human voices home life was beautiful, like that of nearly all the foremost American authors. He liked children, and they liked him. He understood them, entering into their feelings as easily as he entered into their sports. In his own family, discipline — never neglected — was enforced by the gentlest methods; and he had unbounded interest in the details of the school life of his own children, getting them to talk to him as freely as they did to their comrades. This was but an example of his willingness always to put himself in the place of others and to try to see things from their point of view. An instance of this sympathetic faculty, and of his abiding simplicity, was his comment on the minister who went up to the pulpit after Emerson had lectured, and who prayed that they might be delivered from ever again hearing such "transcendental nonsense." Emerson listened to this, and remarked quietly, "He seems a very conscientious, plain-spoken man."

In 1847 Emerson made a second voyage to Europe, sailing in October and coming home in July of the following year. The most of the time he spent in England, lecturing often, meeting the most distinguished men and women of Great Britain, studying matters and men in the little island. In the summer he crossed the Channel to France, and saw Paris in the heat of the revolution of 1848. After his return to America he resumed his lecturing, pushing as far west as the Mississippi.

Certain of the lectures prepared for delivery in England supplied the material for his next book — "Representative Men" — published in 1850. Only two of Emerson's books have any singleness of scheme, and this is one of them. He discusses first the uses of great men, and then he considers in turn Plato, Swedenborg, Montaigne, Shakspeare, Napoleon, and Goethe — great men, all of them, interesting in themselves and doubly interesting as Emerson reflects their images in his clear mirror. It is instructive to contrast Emerson's hopeful and helpful treatment of these "Representative Men" with Carlyle's doleful and robustious writing upon the kindred topic of "Heroes and Hero Worship."

The observations Emerson had made of English life during his two visits had been used in various lectures, and from these he made a book, published in 1856, under the title of "English Traits." For close argument he had no fitness and no liking, but this volume has more logical sequence than any other of his. It may be said almost to have a plan. It opens with a narrative of his first voyage to England, and it contains a study of the character of the British. It is perhaps the keenest book ever written about a great people by a foreigner.

Emerson had a singularly keen sense of the ridiculous, he had an uncommon share of common sense, and he had a marvelous insight into humanity; and it is therefore the highest possible testimony to the substantial merits of the British that they stood so well the ordeal of his examination. He was too sturdy an American to be taken in by the glamour of the aristocratic arrangement of their society; he saw clearly the weakness of the British system, but he was never hostile, and never patronizing; he was always ready to praise boldly.

The spirit of the book can be shown by the extract from a letter he wrote to a friend in America just before his return: "I leave England with increased respect for the Englishman, . . . the more generous that I have no sympathy for him." Emerson expressed his admiration heartily, but he rejoiced always that he lived in a society free from the traditions of feudalism.

In his own country he was a good citizen, taking part in town meeting, and doing his share of town work — even accepting his election as a hog-reeve of Concord. Declaring always the duty and the dignity of labor, he detested the system of slavery under which white men were supported by the toil of black men. He did not join the abolitionists, but his voice was strong on the side of freedom. He spoke out plainly during the strife in Kansas, and again after the hanging of John Brown. Yet he was like Goethe in finding patriotism too narrow for him: he looked forward and he foresaw the Brotherhood of Man. But no intensely national poet, no Hugo, no Tennyson, was more stimulating to his country. He it was who had edged the resolve of the American people when the hour came for stern battle. Lowell said that to Emerson more than to all other causes "the young martyrs of our Civil War owe the sustaining strength of thoughtful heroism that is so touching in every record of their lives."

When the war came at last, Emerson was unfailingly hopeful. He delivered an address on the Emancipation Proclamation, declaring the young happy in that they then found the pestilence of slavery cleansed out of the earth. On New Year's Day, 1863, he read his noble "Boston Hymn," with its rough and resonant verses; and in the same year he wrote the "Voluntaries," wherein we find this lofty and inspiring quatrain:—

So nigh is grandeur to our dust,
So near is God to man,
When Duty whispers low, Thou must,
The youth replies, I can.

And at the meeting held at Concord in memory of Abraham Lincoln, he made a short address in which he set forth the character of the fallen leader with the utmost sympathy and the clearest insight.

A collection of Emerson's later essays had been published in 1860 under the title of the first of them, the "Conduct of Life"; and in 1870 another collection followed, also named after the opening paper, "Society and Solitude." There can be found in these volumes the same wit and paradox, the same felicity of phrase, the same beauty of thought, the same elevation of spirit, that we find in his earlier volumes.

Emerson grew but little as he became older; he was at the end very much what he was at the beginning. He admitted his own "incapacity for methodical writing." However inspiring, every sentence stands by itself; the paragraphs might be rearranged almost at random without loss to the essential value of the essays. Emerson made no effort to formulate his doctrine; he had no compact system of philosophy. Perhaps he was not a philosopher in the strict sense of the word; but rather a maker of golden sayings, full of vital suggestion, to help men to be themselves and to make the utmost of themselves.

For years Emerson had extended his winter lecturing tours as far west as the Mississippi; and in 1871 he accepted the invitation of a friend to visit California, bearing the fatigue of the long journey with unwearied cheerfulness. Toward the end of 1872 he sailed for Europe, on a third visit to the Old World. In England and France and Italy he met again his friends of former years, and he wandered on as far as Egypt, where he had never been before. He was back again in Concord the next spring, and his return home was marked by an outpouring of all his townsmen to welcome him among them once more.

For several years Emerson had written but little, although he continued now and then to draw out new essays and make addresses from the store of lectures he had by him. Thus in 1870 he had given a course of university lectures at Harvard on the "Natural History of the Intellect," and in 1878 he read a lecture on the "Fortune of the Republic," written and already delivered in war time fifteen years before. And in 1875 yet another collection of his essays was published under the title of the first paper, "Letters and Social Aims." This volume had been prepared for the press by an old friend, for Emerson's powers were beginning to fail. He retained possession of his faculties to the last; but though his mind was clear, he had increasing difficulty in recalling the words to express his ideas. He forgot not only proper names, but even the names of common things, while keeping the power of describing them in the words he had left. So, when he wanted to say "umbrella" once, and was unable to recall the name, he said, "I can't tell its name, but I can tell its history. Strangers take it away." Emerson looked calmly forward to death, and it came when he was nearly seventy-nine years of age, on April 27, 1882.

Benjamin Franklin, born in Boston almost a century before Ralph Waldo Emerson was born there, lived long enough to see the straggling colonies with their scant four hundred thousand settlers grow into a vigorous young nation of four million inhabitants. Emerson, born only thirteen years after Franklin's death, lived long enough to see the United States increase to thirty-eight, and a population of five and a half millions expand to a population of fifty millions. He survived to behold a little nation grow to be a mighty people, able to fight a righteous war without flinching.

Different as they are, Franklin and Emerson are both typical Americans — taken together they give us the two sides of the American character. Franklin stands for the real, and Emerson for the ideal. Franklin represents the prose of American life, and Emerson the poetry. Franklin's power is limited by the bounds of common sense, while Emerson's appeal is to the wider imagination. Where Emerson advises you to "hitch your wagon to a star," Franklin is ready with an improved axle-grease for the wheels. Franklin declares that honesty is the best policy; and Emerson insists on honesty as the only means whereby a man may be free to undertake higher things. Self-reliance was at the core of the doctrine of each of them, but one urged self-help in the material world and the other in the spiritual. Hopeful they were, both of them, and kindly, and shrewd; and in the making of the American people, in the training and in the guiding of this immense population, no two men have done more than these two sons of New England.

QUESTIONS. — Compare the antecedents of Emerson with those of several earlier American authors.

Speak of Emerson's boyhood and student days, and of his choice of a profession.

How did the year 1833 influence Emerson's later life?

How did Emerson become the leader of advanced thought in America?

What may be said of Emerson as an essayist? And as a poet?

Show how Emerson, in two books that grew out of his second visit to Europe, displayed the breadth of his sympathies.

Discuss the quality of Emerson's patriotism.

What evidence do you find in Emerson's later books to show the early maturing of his mind?

Describe the last years of Emerson's life.

Compare Emerson and Franklin as typical Americans.

NOTE.—The only complete edition of Emerson's works is that published by Houghton Mifflin (12 vols.). The poems are contained in one volume of the Household Edition. There are now cheap editions of certain of the earlier volumes of essays. "The American Scholar," "Self-Reliance," and "Compensation" are included in a single volume (American Book Company). The "Fortune of the Republic and other American Addresses," including "The American Scholar," forms one number of the Riverside Literature series (Houghton Mifflin).

There are biographies by J. Elliot Cabot (Houghton Mifflin), by Richard Garnett (Scribner), by Alexander Ireland, by E. W. Emerson (Houghton Mifflin), by O. W. Holmes in the American Men of Letters series (Houghton Mifflin), and by G. E. Woodberry in the English Men of Letters, American series (Macmillan).

For criticism, see Lowell's "Fable for Critics" and "Emerson the Lecturer" in "My Study Windows" (Houghton Mifflin); E. C. Stedman in "Poets of America" (Houghton Mifflin); G. W. Curtis in "Literary and Social Essays" (Harper); John Burroughs in "Indoor Studies" (Houghton Mifflin); W. C. Brownell in "American Prose Masters" (Scribner); and P. E. More in the "Cambridge History of American Literature" (Putnam). For an account of the Transcendental movement and of the Brook Farm experiment, see Frothingham's "George Ripley" in the American Men of Letters series (Houghton Mifflin) and his history of "Transcendentalism in New England." Lindsay Swift has written a volume on "Brook Farm" (Macmillan).

IX NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE

THE little town of Salem in Massachusetts is memorable chiefly because of the pitiful witchcraft trials held there two hundred years ago. One of the judges most active in the task of convicting the poor creatures then accused of evil practices was John Hathorne. In Salem there lived, first and last, six generations of this family (spelling its name sometimes Hathorne and sometimes Hawthorne); and in Salem Judge Hathorne's grandson's grandson was born in 1804 on the Fourth of July — a fitting birthday for an author so intensely American as Nathaniel Hawthorne.

Four years after the boy's birth, his father, a sea captain, died at Surinam; and his mother never recovered from the blow of her husband's death, withdrawing herself wholly from society, and living for forty years the life of a recluse, even to the extent of taking her meals apart from her children.

When Nathaniel Hawthorne was eight or nine years old his mother took up her residence on the banks of Sebago Lake in Maine, where the family owned a large tract of land. Here the boy ran wild, fishing and swimming, shooting and skating—and, on the rainy days, reading. This life in the woods increased the liking for solitude which he inherited from his mother, and which in after years he was never able wholly to overcome. In time he went back to Salem to prepare for college. In 1821, being then seventeen, he entered Bowdoin, having Long-follow for a classmate, and making a close friend of Franklin Pierce, who was in the class before him and who was afterward President of the United States.

Hawthorne's Birthplace, Salem, Mass.

He was graduated in 1825, and he then went back to Salem. The family was fairly well-to-do, and it was not needful for Nathaniel to hurry in choosing a profession. He had already decided that he wished to be an author, but authorship offered little chance of a livelihood. There was not then a single prosperous magazine in the United States. Yet the "Sketch Book" and the "Spy," the pioneers of American literature, had been published not five years before; and the success of Irving and of Cooper, and the prompt appreciation with which their early writings were received both in America and in England, was encouraging to other native authors. So the year after he left college Hawthorne wrote a tale and published it at his own expense; but it made no impression on the public, and very few copies were sold.

The tale appeared without the author's name, and its failure seems to have increased Hawthorne's love of solitude. For ten years and more he lived in his mother's house almost as alone as if he were a hermit in a cave. For months together he scarcely met any one outside of his own family, seldom going out save at twilight or to take the nearest way to the desolate seashore. Once a year, or thereabouts (so he told a friend a long while after), he used to make an excursion of a few weeks, "in which I enjoyed as much of life as other people do in the whole year's round." Unnatural as this existence was, Hawthorne kept his health and seldom lost his cheerfulness. He read endlessly and he wrote unceasingly. These were his 'prentice years of authorship; and in them he became a master of the craft of writing.

Most of his early attempts at fiction he burned; but in time his hand became surer, and he found that he had learned at last the difficult art of story telling. His little tales began to be published here and there in monthlies and in annuals. Being anonymous, or under differing signatures, they did not attract attention to the author; but in the newspaper notices of the periodicals in which they appeared, they were often picked out for praise.

This finally encouraged Hawthorne to gather a score of them into a single volume published in 1837 under the apt title of "Twice-Told Tales." Although the little book had no remarkable sale, it won its way steadily; and the readers who had enjoyed Irving's pleasant sketches of New York character in "Rip Van Winkle" and the "Legend of Sleepy Hollow" could not but remark that Hawthorne's pictures of New England character revealed a stronger imagination and a deeper insight into human nature. Delightful as was Irving's writing, Hawthorne had a richer style and a firmer grasp of the art of fiction.

After the publication of this collection of short-stories, Hawthorne ceased to be what he once called himself — "the obscurest man of letters in America." His class-mate Longfellow, with whom he had not been intimate in college, reviewed the book with hearty commendation. Hawthorne wrote him that hitherto there had "been no warmth of approbation, so that I have always written with benumbed fingers." Now at last he basked in the sunshine of public approval, and he was encouraged to go on with his writing. Yet it was five years before his next book was issued, and even then the new volume was only a second series of "Twice-Told Tales," collected from the periodicals.

But meanwhile he had come out into the world again, and mixed once more with his fellow-men. He had edited a magazine for a few months; he had held a place for two years in the Boston customhouse; he had been one of those who formed a settlement at Brook Farm; and he had married Miss Sophia Peabody. The marriage took place in 1842, and the young couple moved to Concord. They went to live in the house which had been built for Emerson's grandfather, and in which Emerson himself had dwelt ten years before. Hawthorne took for his study the room in this old manse in which Emerson had written "Nature"; and in that room, during the next few years, he wrote stories and sketches which were collected into the two volumes published in 1846 as "Mosses from an Old Manse."

These tales are like those in Hawthorne's earlier collections, but they are unlike any stories ever written anywhere else by anybody else. They are strangely interesting, most of them; they are novel, varied, and ingenious; they are full of fancy; and they have often an allegory hidden within, and a profound moral also, rarely obtruded, but to be found easily by all who take the trouble to seek it. Here may be the best place to note that these same qualities, ripened, perhaps, and enriched by experience, are to be found again in Hawthorne's final collection of tales made six years later, and called, after the first of them, the "Snow Image."

The Old Manse

Hawthorne was happier in these years of manhood than he had been in his youth. It might almost be said that his marriage was the making of him; for that had brought him back into the world before it was too late — before the doors of solitude were closed upon him forever. Yet these early years of wedded life were a time of struggle; for he had lost money, and had little to live on.

Knowing his need of an assured income to bring up his young family, some of his friends in 1846 secured his appointment as surveyor of the port of Salem, the town where he had been born about forty years before. He remained in the customhouse for three years, with increasing dislike for the work; and then he was suddenly removed to make a place for a politician.

When he went home one day, earlier than usual, and told his wife that he had lost his place, she exclaimed: "Oh, then you can write your book!" And when he asked what they were to live on while he was writing this book, she showed him the money she had been saving up, week by week, out of their household expenses.

That very afternoon he sat down and began to write the more serious work of fiction he had longed for leisure to attempt. It was really the first book he had written since the forgotten and unknown romance. The other volumes he had published were but collections of tales, while this was to be a story long enough to stand by itself. A broader experience is needed to compose a full-grown novel than to sketch a short-story, and the great novelists have often essayed their first elaborate fictions when no longer young. Scott was more than forty when he published the first of the Waverley novels; Thackeray was not far from forty when "Vanity Fair" was finished; George Eliot was almost forty when "Adam Bede" appeared; and Hawthorne was forty-six when he sent forth the "Scarlet Letter" in 1850.

With the striking exception of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," no American work of fiction has had the quick and lasting popularity of the "Scarlet Letter"; and while Mrs. Stowe's story owed much of its success to the public interest in the slavery question, Hawthorne's romance had no such outside aid. Hawthorne's study of the Puritan life in New England is superior to Mrs. Stowe's novel. It is a masterpiece of narrative, every incident being so aptly chosen, so skillfully prepared, so well placed, that it seems a necessary result of the situation. Since the "Scarlet Letter" was written more than half a century has passed, and many books highly praised when it was first published are now left unread; but Hawthorne's great story stands to-day higher than ever before in the esteem of those best fitted to judge.

The author thought that the romance was too somber, and he relieved it with a humorous sketch of his life in the Salem customhouse. The reading public gave the book so hearty a welcome that Hawthorne was warmed out of his chilly solitude. For the first time he tasted popularity, and it did him good. He moved to Lenox, and there he wrote a second long story, less solemn than the first, brisker and brighter, and yet not without the same solid and serious merits. The "House of the Seven Gables" was published in 1851. It is rather a romance than a novel; and in it the author allowed his humor more play than had been becoming in the "Scarlet Letter." Like that, the new story was a study of the life the author best knew. How well he knew it may be judged from Lowell's declaration that the "House of the Seven Gables" is "the most valuable contribution to New England history that has yet been made."

A true historian Hawthorne might be in his understanding of the conditions of life in the old colony days, and of the feelings of the men and women who then walked the streets of Salem ; but a story teller he was above all else — a teller of tales to whom every lover of literature could not but listen eagerly. And in the next volume he made ready for the press he presented himself simply as a teller of tales. The "Wonder Book for Girls and Boys," written in the same year as the "House of the Seven Gables," is the book which has most endeared Hawthorne to American children, who have been charmed with the ease and the grace with which he set forth anew the marvelous myths of antiquity.

In the "Wonder Book" he retold the legends of the "Gorgon's Head" and the "Three Golden Apples" and the "Chimaera"; and in "Tanglewood Tales" (which was published two or three years later, but which may be considered as a second volume of the "Wonder Book") he described the adventures of those who went forth to seek the "Golden Fleece," to explore the labyrinth of the "Minotaur," and to sow the "Dragon's Teeth."

His next story for grown-up people was called the "Blithedale Romance," and it was published in 1852. It was derived more or less closely from the memory of his own experiences a few years before at Brook Farm, where a little group of reformers and men of letters, led astray for a moment by some of the notions of the time, sought to simplify their lives by doing themselves the rough work of a New England farm. The most valuable result of this experiment is perhaps Hawthorne's story ; and that story is generally held to be the least interesting and the least

"A negro rather stably disposed, and well-instructed, on horseback, travelling on his own hook, calling for oats and drinking 'plugs of bran dy and water' at the bar - like any other Christian. A young man from Brinsford stands. 'I wish I had a thousand and that he lives in Alabama.' 'If and a quote in preparation on me - the negro was really a human - and to talk of owning a thousand other slaves."

Left North Adams, Sept 11th. } 1838.
 Remains Home. Sept 24th.

Atli. Hackett

satisfactory of all that Hawthorne wrote. Here, indeed, was the instance where he was not fortunate in his choice of a subject.

In the year the "Blithedale Romance" was published Hawthorne went back once more to Concord; and there he bought the house of Mr. Alcott, the father of the author of "Little Women." This house he called "The Wayside," and it was the home of the family until Hawthorne's death. But they did not live in it long at first. One of the candidates for the presidency of the United States was Hawthorne's college friend, Franklin Pierce, for whom he prepared a campaign biography — just as other men of letters have written lives of friends who were candidates for the presidency. When Pierce became President he appointed Nathaniel Hawthorne consul to Liverpool, England, one of the best-paid offices under the government. Hawthorne lived in England for four years; and then he made a journey to France, Switzerland, and Italy, lingering in Rome long enough to gather materials for a new story, and returning in 1859 to England to write it.

This new story, published early in 1860, was the "Marble Faun, a Romance of Monte Beni" (known in England as "Transformation," because the British publisher chose to change the title). It was a tale of life in Italy. The beauty of the story is felt by all its readers, and its power cannot be denied. But the book abounds in shadowy suggestions; and some of its outlines are so misty that we are still a little in doubt as to what did happen to all of the characters. Never before had Hawthorne been more vaguely mysterious; and rarely before had the magic of his manner been more charming to his admirers.

Perhaps the vagueness of this story was the result of its scene being laid upon a foreign soil, whereon Hawthorne did not feel himself absolutely at home. At the very time he was planning the "Marble Faun" he recorded in his notebook that "it needs the native air to give life a reality." Despite its hazily hinted plot, the "Marble Faun" is cherished by Hawthorne's admirers as second only to the "Scarlet Letter." And, as it happened, it was the last of his romances he was to live long enough to complete.

The Wayside

In 1860 Hawthorne returned to his native air, settling down in "The Wayside" at Concord. He planted trees, laid out walks, enlarged the house, and made himself at home. He had a theme for a new romance; and this he sketched out two or three times, and differently every time, but never to his own satisfaction.

Failing to get the strange subject of this proposed tale into the perfect form he sought, Hawthorne turned from it for a while. He had always kept a journal, writing in it freely when the mood was on him, setting down suggestions for stories, recording visits and conversations, and describing people and places. From this storehouse he now selected passages concerning England and the English, and these he wove into a series of characteristic chapters, published in 1863. The title which Hawthorne gave to these collected papers was "Our Old Home" — and the title itself was an evidence of the kindly and fraternal feeling of Americans toward the elder branch of the race. This same gentle liking inspired the English pages of Irving's "Sketch Book"; and it also controlled the criticism in Emerson's acute "English Traits."

After the publication of this volume of descriptive papers, Hawthorne returned to his story, and finally managed to write the earlier chapters. But his health was failing fast, and he was not able to finish what he had begun. He made several little journeys in search of relief; and it was on one of these, a trip to the White Mountains with Franklin Pierce, that he died. His death took place at Plymouth, New Hampshire, a little before midnight on May 18, 1864; and on the twenty-third he was buried at Concord in the cemetery called "Sleepy Hollow."

Emerson and Longfellow, Lowell and Whittier, were at the funeral. Longfellow wrote in his diary: "It was a lovely day; the village all sunshine and blossoms and the song of birds. You cannot imagine anything at once more sad and beautiful. He is buried on a hilltop under the pines."

And this funeral of his classmate suggested to Longfellow one of his most tender poems:—

Now I look back, and meadow, manse, and stream
Dimly my thought defines ;
I only see — a dream within a dream —
The hilltop hearsed with pines.

* * * * *

There in seclusion and remote from men
The wizard hand lies cold,
Which at its topmost speed let fall the pen,
And left the tale half told.

At intervals since Hawthorne's death all the writings he left behind him have been published, one after another — his private letters, the notebooks he kept irregularly in America and in Europe, and the several efforts he made to shape the story he finally left unfinished when he died. But the publication of these things never intended for the public has not interfered with his fame. Though they did not add to it, they did not detract from it. They took us in some measure into his workshop, but they could not reveal the secret of his art: that died with him. They showed that his English was always pure and clear, and that his style was always simple and noble. They revealed little or nothing of real value for an estimate of the author, though they served to confirm the belief that he brooded long over his tales and his romances, shaping each to the inward moral it was to declare, and perfecting each slowly until it had attained in every detail the symmetry which should satisfy his own most exacting taste.

Many have marveled that Hawthorne should have been able to write romances here in this new country of ours, which seems to lack all that others have considered needful for romance; but to a seer of his insight this was no difficult matter. Hawthorne was able to find romance not in external trappings and picturesque fancy costumes, but deep down in the soul of man himself.

Besides this power of entering into the recesses of the human heart, he had also a vigorous imagination, great ingenuity in inventing incident, and the gift of the story-telling faculty in a high degree. These qualities all combined to make the "Scarlet Letter" the most perfectly proportioned work of fiction that America has yet produced.

QUESTIONS.—What can you say of the Hawthorne family; of Nathaniel Hawthorne's early life and of his education?

Describe Hawthorne's life during his early years of authorship.

What characteristics of Hawthorne's writings enabled him to find a growing audience among the admirers of Irving and Cooper?

How was Hawthorne brought back into the world before the doors of solitude were closed upon him forever?

How did he find the opportunity to begin the work of his life?

Compare the "Scarlet Letter" with the only American work of fiction which has had as quick and lasting a popularity as it has enjoyed.

Tell how he succeeded in interesting children in one of his works.

How did Hawthorne suddenly find his course of life turned in a new direction?

How may Hawthorne's life for the next few years account for the shadowy character of the most skillfully mysterious of his stories?

What evidence may the reader of Hawthorne find in his works that he shared the sentiments of at least two other famous American writers toward the elder branch of the English-speaking race?

What qualities combined to make Hawthorne the greatest American writer of fiction that has yet appeared?

NOTE.—The only complete editions of Hawthorne's works are those issued by Houghton Mifflin. (Popular edition, 8 vols. Riverside edition with notes by G. P. Lathrop, 13 vols.)

There are biographies by G. P. Lathrop (Houghton Mifflin), Henry James (Harper), Julian Hawthorne (Houghton Mifflin), M. D. Conway (Scribner), and G. E. Woodberry (Houghton Mifflin).

For criticism, see Poe's review of "Twice Told Tales"; G. W. Curtis in "Literary and Social Essays" (Harper); T. W. Higginson in "Short Studies of American Authors" (Longmans); Leslie Stephen in "Hours in a Library" (Putnam); W. D. Howells in "My Literary Passions" (Harper); and W. C. Brownell in "American Prose Masters" (Scribner).

X HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW

In the first ten years of the nineteenth century, there were born in New England five of the foremost authors of America. Emerson and Hawthorne were respectively four and three years older than Longfellow. Whittier and Holmes were respectively ten months and two years younger. As they grew up and began to write, and got to know one another, these authors became friends; and their friendship lasted with their lives. One after another they all gained fame; and although not the greatest of the five, perhaps, Longfellow was always the most popular. Not merely in the United States and Great Britain, but in Canada and Australia and India, and wherever the English language is spoken, there were readers in plenty for the gentle, the manly, the beautiful verses of Longfellow.

His mother's father had been a general in the Revolutionary army. His mother's brother (after whom he was named) had been an officer in the American navy, losing his life in Preble's attack on Tripoli. His father, once a member of Congress, was one of the leading lawyers of Portland. And it was in that pleasant Maine city that Henry Wadsworth Longfellow was born, on February 27, 1807. There he passed his childhood. There he got that liking for the sea and for ships and for sailors which was to give a salt-water savor to so many of his ballads. There, as he grew to boyhood, he browsed amid the books of his father's ample library, feeling his love for literature steadily growing.

Longfellow's Birthplace

He was a schoolboy of twelve when the first numbers of Irving's "Sketch Book" appeared, and he read it "with ever-increasing wonder and delight, spellbound by its pleasant humor, its melancholy tenderness, its atmosphere of revery." A few months before the "Sketch Book" began, Bryant had published his "Thanatopsis," and others of his earlier poems followed soon; so the schoolboy in Portland came under the influence of Bryant's poetry almost at the same time that he felt the charm of Irving's prose. When he was only thirteen the young Longfellow began to write verses of his own, some of which were printed in the newspapers. He was only fourteen when he passed the entrance examinations of Bowdoin College, where he was to have Hawthorne as a classmate.

Long before his college course was over he had made up his mind to become a man of letters. In his last year at Bowdoin, being then eighteen, he wrote to his father: "I most eagerly aspire after future eminence in literature; my whole soul burns ardently for it, and every earthly thought centers in it." But here in America, in 1825, no man could hope to support himself by prose and verse.

Fortunately just then a professorship of modern languages was founded in Bowdoin, and the position was offered to Longfellow, with permission to spend several years in Europe fitting himself for his duties. He accepted eagerly; and his sojourn in France and Spain, in Italy and Germany, made him master of the four great European languages with their marvelous literatures. He studied hard and wrote little while he was away. At last, in 1829, being then twenty-two, he returned to his native land and settled down to teach his fellow-countrymen what he had learned abroad.

In 1831 he married Miss Mary Potter. In addition to his work in the college, he found time to write critical articles on foreign literature. He seems to have had but few poetic impulses at this period; and his thoughts expressed themselves more naturally in prose. The influence of Irving is visible in a series of rambling travel sketches, finally revised for publication as a book in 1833, under the title "Outre-Mer: a Pilgrimage beyond the Sea." It has not a little of the charm of the "Sketch Book," with a deeper poetic grace of its own and a more romantic aroma. The year after this first venture into literature, Longfellow was called to the professorship of modern languages at Harvard College. Again he went to Europe for further study, being absent for a year and a half; but his journey was saddened by the death of his wife. Toward the end of 1836 he took up his abode in Cambridge, where he was to reside for the rest of his life—for forty-five years. He was made to feel at home in the society of the scholars who clustered about Harvard, then almost the sole center of culture in the country.

Longfellow's Residence. Cambridge, Mass.

His work for the college was not so exacting that he had not time for literature. The impulse to write poetry returned; yet the next book he published was the prose "Hyperion," which appeared in 1839, and which, though it has little plot or action, may be called a romance. The youthful and poetic hero, a passionate pilgrim in Europe, was, more or less, a reflection of Longfellow himself.

A few months later, in the same year, he published his first volume of poetry — "Voices of the Night," in which he reprinted certain of his earlier verses, most of them written while he was at Bowdoin. Some of these boyish verses show the influence of Bryant, and others reveal to us that the young poet had not yet looked at life for himself, but still saw it through the stained-glass windows of European tradition. The same volume contained also some more recent poems: the "Beleaguered City," and the "Reaper and the Flowers," and the "Psalm of Life" — perhaps the first of his poems to win a swift and abiding popularity. These lyrics testified that Longfellow was beginning to have a style of his own. As Hawthorne wrote to him, "Nothing equal to them was ever written in this world — this western world, I mean."

Certainly no American author had yet written any poem of the kind so good as the best of those in Longfellow's volume of "Ballads" printed two years later. Better than any other American poet Longfellow had mastered the difficulties of the story in song; and he knew how to combine the swiftness and the picturesqueness the ballad requires. His ballads have more of the old-time magic, more of the early simplicity, than those of any other modern English author. Of its kind, there is nothing better in the language than the "Skeleton in Armor," with its splendid lyric swing; and the "Village Blacksmith" and the "Wreck of the 'Hesperus'" are almost as good in their humble sphere. "Excelsior," in the same volume, voices the noble aspirations of youth, and has been taken to heart by thousands of boys and girls.

He went to Europe again in 1842 for his health; and on the voyage home he wrote eight "Poems on Slavery," which he published soon after he landed. The next year he married Miss Frances Appleton. About the same time he published the "Spanish Student," a play not intended for the theater, and lacking the dramatic action the stage demands. Neither the "Poems on Slavery" nor the "Spanish Student" showed him at his best; but three years after the latter he published the "Belfry of Bruges," in which were to be found more than one of his finest poems, among them the "Old Clock on the Stairs" and the "Arsenal at Springfield."

Longfellow wrote a cordial review of Hawthorne's "Twice-Told Tales," and it was from Hawthorne that he heard the pathetic legend of the two Acadian lovers parted on their marriage morn, when the people of the French province were shipped away by the British authorities. "If you do not want this incident for a tale, let me have it for a poem," he said; and Hawthorne willingly gave it up.

This was the germ of "Evangeline," which Longfellow published in 1847, and which was accepted at once as his masterpiece. It was the most beautiful and the most touching tale in verse yet told by any American poet; and its charm was increased greatly by the skill with which the natural scenery of America, and our varying seasons, were used to furnish a background before which the simple figures of the story moved with fidelity to life. Even the strange proper names were invested with magic.

In 1849 Longfellow published his last prose book, "Kavanagh," a dreamy tale which Hawthorne hailed as a true picture of life — "as true as those reflections of the trees and banks that I used to see in Concord; but refined to a higher degree than they, as if the reflection were itself reflected." The next year he gathered into a volume called the "Seaside and the Fireside" a score of short poems, including the "Fire of Driftwood" and the "Building of the Ship." With the sea as a subject, Longfellow had always a double share of inspiration, for he had retained in manhood his boyish love for the deep, and his sympathetic understanding of its mysteries.

As his poetic powers ripened and won prompt recognition, the daily labor of the classroom became more irksome to him, and at last, in 1854, he resigned his professorship. But he continued to reside in Cambridge, dwelling in the Craigie House, which had been Washington's headquarters. Longfellow's father-in-law had bought this home for him, and it is now known as the Longfellow House. The cultivated society of the little town was very congenial, and he had many friends in Boston and in Concord.

Like all true artists, he was greatly interested in his craft, and was fond of verse-making experiments. He had a delicate ear, and he felt the fitness of certain measures for certain themes. For "Evangeline" he chose a form of verse suggested by the verse of the "Iliad" and the "Aeneid"; and how well this suited his subject can be seen by reading this description of the song of the mocking-bird:—

Then from a neighboring thicket the mocking-bird, wildest of singers, Swinging aloft on a willow spray that hung o'er the water,
Shook from his little throat such floods of delirious music,
That the whole air and the woods and the waves seemed silent to listen.

Plaintive at first were the tones and sad; then soaring to madness Seemed they to follow or guide the revel of frenzied Bacchantes.
Single notes were then heard, in sorrowful low lamentation;
Till, having gathered them all, he flung them abroad in derision,

As when, after a storm, a gust of wind through the tree-tops
Shakes down the rattling rain in a crystal shower on the branches.

Now compare the same description as Longfellow himself rewrote it in the customary rimed couplets :—

Upon a spray that overhung the stream,
The mocking-bird, awaking from his dream,
Poured such delirious music from his throat
That all the air seemed listening to his note.
Plaintive at first the song began, and slow ;
It breathed of sadness, and of pain and woe ;
Then, gathering all his notes, abroad he flung
The multitudinous music from his tongue, —
As, after showers, a sudden gust again
Upon the leaves shakes down the rattling rain.

In his next long poem Longfellow attempted another new meter, borrowed from the old Finnish poets. He was always interested in the American Indian, and one of his earliest poems was the "Burial of the Minnisink," as one of his latest was the "Revenge of Rain-in-the-face." He now decided that the mythical legends of the red men could be woven into a poem of which an Indian should be the central figure. The simple rhythm was exactly suited to the simple story. "Hiawatha" was published in 1855, and its instant success surpassed that of "Evangeline," which was its only rival among the longer poems of American authors upon a peculiarly American subject. The easy verses sang themselves into the memory of all who read the poem ; and the descriptions of nature delighted all who had kept their eyes open as they walked through our American woods and fields.

Encouraged by the hearty welcome given to these two American poems, Longfellow, in 1858, published a third, the "Courtship of Miles Standish." In this he told no pathetic tale of parted lovers, nor did he draw on the quaint lore of the red men ; he took his story from the annals of his own ancestors, the sturdy founders of New England. As it happened, he himself (like his fellow-poet, Bryant) was a direct descendant of John Alden and Priscilla, the Puritan maiden whose wooing he narrated. The "Courtship of Miles Standish" is only less popular than its predecessors, "Evangeline" and "Hiawatha"; all three have been taken to heart by the American people; all were composed during the brightest years of the poet's life, when his family were growing up about him, when he was in the full possession of his powers, and when he had already achieved fame.

Suddenly an awful calamity befell him in the death of his wife by accident. One morning in July, 1861, Mrs. Longfellow's light dress caught fire from a match fallen on the floor. The poet rushed to her aid; but despite all his efforts her injuries were fatal. She died the next morning. Longfellow himself was so severely burned that he was unable to be present at her funeral.

When his wounds healed he was still broken in spirit. To give himself occupation, and to help him bear his sorrow, he translated into English the "Divine Comedy" of Dante. He found the labor of translation restful and consoling, as Bryant had also found it after the death of his wife. In time Longfellow completed his version of the great Italian poem, and it was published in 1867. But while laboring on this long task he had not given up original composition. In 1863 he had sent forth a volume of poems containing the ringing lines on the sinking of the "Cumberland"; and in 1867 another collection in which was included his touching poem on the burial of Hawthorne.

Saw the rainbow in the heavens,
In the sunset sky, the rainbow,
Whispered; "What is that, Nekomis?"
And the good Nekomis answered;
"Is the heavens of flowers you see there;
All the wild-flowers of the forest,
All the lilies of the prairies,
When on earth they fade and perish
Blossom in the heaven above us."

Henry W. Longfellow.

Nov 13. 1881.

During these years also Longfellow was engaged on a work exactly suited to his powers. As a poet he was not primarily a thinker, like Emerson, nor was he chiefly a musician in verse, like Poe; he was above all a ballad singer, a teller of stories fit to be said or sung. Certain of his friends were in the habit of spending the summer at the old tavern of Sudbury, and this suggested to the poet the framework of a book. He has represented a group of guests gathered about the fire, and beguiling the time with story telling. The first part of these "Tales of a Wayside Inn" was published in 1863, and two other parts followed in 1872 and 1873. Among the tales are some of Longfellow's best ballads—such as "Paul Revere's Ride," "King Robert of Sicily," and "Scanderbeg."

In the spring of 1868 Longfellow went with his daughters to Europe, and received everywhere an admiring welcome. In England both Oxford and Cambridge conferred honorary degrees on him; and the Queen invited him to dine with her at Windsor Castle. He spent the winter in Rome, and came home in 1869.

After his return Longfellow took up and finished his longest work—"Christus, a Mystery," in which he finally combined the "Divine Tragedy," the "Golden Legend," and the "New England Tragedies." His liking for the dramatic form grew in his later years; and the "Masque of Pandora," which he published in 1875, was actually set to music and sung on the stage, but with little success. Afterward he wrote another tragedy—"Judas Macca-baeus"; and after his death yet another, "Michael Angelo," was found almost finished in his desk. There are fine passages in all these poems in dialogue; but no one of his attempts at play-making was received with the popular approval which greeted his songs and his sonnets.

Two of the longer of his later poems—the “Hanging of the Crane” (1874) and “Keramos” (1878)—showed that his hand had not lost its cunning as the poet grew older; and nothing he had written exceeded in sonorous rhythm and in lofty sentiment the poem which he read in 1875 at the fiftieth anniversary of his graduation from Bowdoin, and which he called “Morituri Salutamus” (“We who are about to die salute you”).

His poetic gift continued to ripen and to bear mellow fruit to the end of his life; and among the lyrics in his final volumes—“Ultima Thule,” published in 1880, and “In the Harbor,” printed after his death in 1882—were poems as tender and as delicate in their strength as any he had written in his youth: the “Chamber over the Gate,” for example, and the very last verses he ever wrote—the “Bells of San Blas.”

It was on March 15, 1882, when Longfellow had just celebrated his seventy-fifth birthday, that he penned the final lines of this final poem:—

Out of the shadows of night
The world rolls into light.
It is daybreak everywhere.

The eighteenth was on a Saturday; and in the afternoon there came four schoolboys from Boston, who had asked permission to visit him. He showed them the view of the Charles from the window of his study, and with his customary kindness he wrote his autograph in their albums. That night he was seized with pain; but he would not disturb the household until the morning. He lingered a week, and died on Friday, March 24, 1882. He was buried the next Sunday in Mount Auburn Cemetery, “under the gently falling snow.”

Longfellow is the most popular poet yet born in America; and if we can measure popular approval by the widespread sale of his successive volumes, he was probably the most popular poet of the English language in his century. Part of his popularity is due to his healthy mind, his calm spirit, his vigorous sympathy. His thought, though often deep, was never obscure. His lyrics had always a grace that took the ear with delight. They have a singing simplicity, caught, it may be, from the German lyrists, such as Uhland or Heine. This simplicity was the result of rare artistic repression; it was not due to any poverty of intellect.

Like Victor Hugo in France, Longfellow in America was the poet of childhood. And as he understood the children, so he also sympathized with the poor, the toiling, the lowly — not looking down on them, but glorifying their labor, and declaring the necessity of it and the nobility of work. He could make the barest life seem radiant with beauty. He had acquired the culture of all lands, but he understood also the message of his own country. He thought that the best that Europe could bring was none too good for the plain people of America. He was a true American, not only in his stalwart patriotism in the hour of trial, but in his loving acceptance of the doctrine of human equality, and in his belief and trust in his fellow-man.

QUESTIONS. — What was Longfellow's place among the men who formed a remarkable group in New England in the first quarter of the present century?

Speak of Longfellow's family connections; of his boyhood; and of his opportunities for gaining an education.

In what official way was Longfellow's scholarship recognized by two institutions of learning?

In what early works does Longfellow show the influence of two earlier American authors — one a writer in prose, the other in verse?

By what one of his poems did Longfellow win a swift and abiding popularity?

What is the secret of his success in the kind of poems of which the "Skeleton in Armor" is an example?

What events of importance to Longfellow clustered around the year 1843?

Mention the circumstances under which Longfellow came to write the most beautiful tale in verse that had yet been told by any American poet.

How was Longfellow's last prose work characterized by Hawthorne? How is Longfellow's skill in versification shown in his poems?

What American subjects now furnished Longfellow with the themes of two poems which rivaled in popularity even his story of the Acadian exiles?

What did Longfellow do after the death of his wife?

Discuss Longfellow's dramatic work.

Give the titles of ten of Longfellow's poems not elsewhere referred to in these questions.

Characterize Longfellow as a man and as a poet.

NOTE. — The only complete edition of Longfellow's works is that published by Houghton Mifflin (11 vols.). The Cambridge edition contains all the poems in a single volume. "Evangeline," the "Courtship of Miles Standish," "The Song of Hiawatha," the "Children's Hour," etc., the "Tales of a Wayside Inn," the "Building of the Ship," etc., can be had as separate numbers of the Riverside Literature series (Houghton Mifflin).

The fullest life of Longfellow is that written by his brother, Samuel, and containing abundant extracts from his journal and correspondence (Houghton Mifflin, 3 vols.). T. W. Higginson prepared a volume for the American Men of Letters series (Houghton Mifflin), and G. R. Carpenter another for the Beacon Biographies (Small Maynard).

For criticism, see E. C. Stedman in "Poets of America" (Houghton Mifflin); H. E. Scudder in "Men and Letters" (Houghton Mifflin); A. Lang in "Letters on Literature" (Longmans); G. W. Curtis in "Literary and Social Essays" (Harper); T. W. Higginson in "Old Cambridge" (Macmillan); W. D. Howells in "Literary Friends and Acquaintance" (Harper).

XI JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER

IN the town of Haverhill, Massachusetts, near the Merrimac River, not far from Salisbury Beach, and in a house built by his great-great-grandfather more than two centuries ago, John Greenleaf Whittier was born on December 17, 1807. He believed that his ancestors were Huguenots—and this French stock is among the ablest and the sturdiest of all the many which have mingled to make the modern American. For three generations before him, the family had been connected with the Society of Friends; and all his life long Whittier retained not a little of the Quaker simplicity of manner and attire.

The house was surrounded by woods, and "a small brook, noisy enough as it foamed, rippled, and laughed down its rocky falls," by the garden-side. Then it wound its way to a larger stream, that, "after doing its duty at two or three saw and grist mills" (the clash of which would be heard in still days across the intervening woodlands), ran into the great river and was borne along to the great sea. Thus in early boyhood Whittier had a chance to get friendly and familiar with brooks and woods and rocky hills and all the other details of the New England landscape. He began early to do the chores of the household and also to aid his father in the work of the farm. He helped to care for the oxen and the other beasts of burden, and he came to know the wilder animals which also lived on the farm. His chief companion was a sister, who was six years younger, and who devoted herself to him for half a century.

Whittier's Birthplace

In his boyhood Whittier had scant instruction, for the district school was open only a few weeks in winter, and its teachers were rarely competent. He had but few books, for there were scarcely thirty in the house, mostly dry disquisitions on theology. The one book he could read and read again until he had it by heart almost was the Bible; and the Bible was always the book which exerted the strongest literary influence upon him.

But when he was fourteen a teacher came who lent him books of travel and opened a new world to him. It was this teacher who brought to the Whittiers one evening a volume of Burns and read aloud some of the poems, after explaining the Scottish dialect. Whittier begged the loan of the book, which contained almost the first rimes he had ever read. It was this volume of Burns which set Whittier to making verses himself, serving both as the motive and the model of his earlier poetic efforts. The Scottish poet, with his homely pictures of a life as bare and as hardy as that of New England then, first revealed to the American poet what poetry really is, and how it might be made out of the actual facts of existence.

That book of Burns's poems had an even stronger influence on Whittier than the odd volume of the "Spectator" which fell into the hands of Franklin had on that American author whose boyhood was most like Whittier's. Franklin was also born in a humble and hard-working family, doing early his share of the labor, and having but a meager education, although always longing for learning. It is true that Irving and Cooper and Bryant did not graduate from college, but they could have done so had they persevered; and Emerson and Longfellow and Hawthorne did get as much of the higher education as was then possible in America. But neither Franklin nor Whittier ever had the chance; it was as much as they could do in boyhood to pick up the merest elements of an education.

After he had made the acquaintance of Burns's poems, Whittier began to scribble rimes of his own on his slate at school, and in the evening about the family hearth. One of his boyish quatrains lingered in the memory of an elder sister: —

And must I always swing the flail,
And help to fill the milking pail?
I wish to go away to school;
I do not wish to be a fool.

With practice he began to be bolder, and he wrote verses on contemporary events and also little ballads. One of these, written when he was seventeen, his eldest sister liked so well that she sent it to the weekly paper of Newburyport, the Free Press, recently started by William Lloyd Garrison. She did this without telling her brother, and no one was more surprised than he when he opened the paper and found his own verses in the "Poet's Corner." He was aiding his father to mend a stone wall by the roadside as the postman passed on horseback and tossed the paper to the young man. "His heart stood still a moment when he saw his own verses. Such delight as his comes only once in the lifetime of any aspirant to literary fame. His father at last called to him to put up the paper and keep at work."

The editor of the Free Press was only three years older than the poet, although far more mature. He did more for the young man than merely print these boyish verses, for he went to Whittier's father and urged the need of giving the youth a little better education. To do this was not possible then; but two years later, when Whittier was nineteen, an academy was started at Haverhill, and here he attended, even writing a few stanzas to be sung at the opening exercises.

He studied at Haverhill for two terms, earning the little money needed to pay his way by making slippers, by keeping books, and by teaching school. At Haverhill he was able to read the works of many authors hitherto unknown to him, and he also wrote for the local papers much prose and verse. There was even an attempt to get subscribers for a collection of his poems, but it failed, fortunately; and the improving taste of Whittier, when he did publish his first volume, led him to reject most of these early verses.

By the time he was twenty-one he had fitted himself to earn his living by his pen. He went to Boston in 1829 to edit a paper there; and he returned to Haverhill the next year to take charge of the local journal. Then he was at the head of an important weekly at Hartford. In these various positions he acquitted himself well, mastering the questions of the day carefully, and expressing his opinions forcibly and courteously. But his health failed, owing partly perhaps to the exposure and toil of his boyhood on the farm; and in 1832 he gave up journalism for a while and went back to his father's house. He had never been robust, and all his life long he was forced to take care of himself and to husband his strength.

But if the body was weak, the spirit was strong; Whittier had the stout heart which leads a forlorn hope unhesitatingly. Before he was thirty he had made up his mind that it was his duty to do what he could for the relief of the unfortunate negroes who were held in bondage in the South. In 1833 he wrote a pamphlet called "Justice and Expediency," in which he considered the whole question of slavery, and declared the necessity of its abolition. Three years later he became secretary of the Antislavery Society. In 1838 he went to Philadelphia to edit the Pennsylvania Freeman; and so boldly did he advocate the right of the negro to own himself that the printing office was sacked by a mob and burned. Then, as more than once afterward for the same cause, Whittier was in danger of his life.

Whittier showed physical courage in facing the ruffians who wished to prevent free speech; but he had revealed the higher moral courage in casting in his lot with the little band of abolitionists. He had looked forward to political preferment, as well he might, when many another journalist was stepping from the newspaper desk into public life. When he became one of the very small minority who denounced slavery, he gave up all chance of office. He also had literary ambition, but so strong was the power of the slave owners then, and so intolerant were they, that most editors and publishers were sorely intimidated, and declined to print any attack on slavery, and even the other writings of an author who was known as an abolitionist. Thus Whittier, in identifying himself with the antislavery movement, thought that he was giving up his literary future also. He made his decision promptly, and he never regretted it. Indeed, in later life he said to a boy of fifteen to whom he was giving counsel, "My lad, if thou wouldst win success, join thyself to some unpopular but noble cause."

By constant practice he had acquired ease in composition; but as his hand gained strength his taste also improved, and little of this earlier writing satisfied him for long. A miscellany of prose and verse called "Legends of New England," published in 1831, was his first book. It contained a selection of the best of the poems and the essays he had printed here and there in periodicals. In later life he thought so slightly of this volume that none of the essays, and only two of the poems, were republished in the revised edition of his works. Immature as was this youthful verse, scarcely any American had then written better. Bryant's first volume, and Poe's, had been published several years before; but Longfellow's earliest book of poems, "Voices of the Night," did not appear until 1839, to be followed in 1847 by the first collection of Emerson's poems.

Other poems, which Whittier discarded in later life, were published in the next few years. The most vigorous of the verses he wrote at this time were inspired by his hatred of slavery. From the day he threw himself into the abolition movement, his verse had a loftier note and a more resonant tone. With him poetry was then no longer a mere amusement or accomplishment; it had become a weapon for use in the good fight.

In these antislavery poems there is a noble passion and a righteous anger. They were calls to a battle with evil; and the best of them rang out like blasts of a bugle. One collection of these antislavery verses was published in 1837, and a second, called "Voices of Freedom," appeared in 1849. When we compare either of these volumes with Longfellow's "Poems on Slavery" (printed in 1842, midway between them), we see how much sturdier Whittier's stanzas are, and how much more his heart is in the cause than Longfellow's. It is Longfellow who writes with Quaker-like gentleness, and it is Whittier who boldly sounds the trumpet of battle.

In other ways also is the contrast between Longfellow and Whittier interesting and instructive. Both were New Englanders, and both abhorred slavery. Longfellow was the most literary of all our poets, and Whittier was perhaps the least. By consummate art Longfellow sometimes achieved simplicity, but he never could attain the homely directness natural to Whittier. Longfellow's chief service to our literature was in showing how it was possible to get the best that Europe and the storied past could give, and yet to remain an American of the present. Whittier dealt almost wholly with the facts of American life, with the legends and the thoughts, with the landscape and the people of New England. Where Longfellow was cosmopolitan, Whittier was less than national even, he was sectional; and he was therefore too local in his themes and in his manner to win popularity in England as Longfellow did. Here in the United States, however, where the influence of New England is widespread and abiding, Whittier came at last to have a popularity second only to Longfellow's, and due largely to the fact that he, more than any other, was the representative poet of New England.

Whittier's Residence, Amesbury, Mass.

Whittier was the only one of the leading American poets who never crossed the Atlantic. Not only did he never go to Europe, he never went south of the Potomac or west of the Alleghanies. When the farm at Haverhill was sold in 1836, part of the price was used to buy a small place at Amesbury; and that house was Whittier's home for more than half a century. After his return from Philadelphia, in 1839, he was rarely absent from Amesbury for more than a month or two at a time, although he did once reside the better part of a year in Lowell. He made visits to Boston often and sometimes even to New York; and frequently he spent his summers elsewhere; but until his death his home was the little house at Amesbury.

Though his abolition sentiments were boldly insisted upon in most of his writings, they did not prevent the steady rise of his poetic reputation even among those who were not of his way of thinking. With the publication in 1843 of "Lays of My Home," Whittier made sure his place among American poets. In this volume are some of the best of his ballads,— "Cassandra Southwick," for one—and as a writer of ballads Longfellow only, among all the American poets, was Whittier's superior.

He had the gift of story-telling in verse. He did not strain his invention to devise a strange plot; he took an old legend or a tale of real life, and he set it forth in rime simply and easily. He had the touch of genius which transfigures common things. He sang of what he knew, the fields where he played as a boy, the river and the hills he had gazed on in childhood, the men and women who had grown up about him, the thoughts and the sentiments he and they had inherited together. Even the unpromising proper names of New England become melodious in his hands.

As the years passed, Whittier's powers ripened and the level of his work was raised ; but the quality of the poems included in "Songs of Labor," published in 1850, and in "Home Ballads," published in 1860, is the quality of the collection published in 1843. Among the verse written during these seventeen years are the "Angels of Buena Vista"; "Maud Muller" (perhaps the most popular of all his briefer poems), "Ichabod" (perhaps the loftiest of all laments over fallen greatness); the "Barefoot Boy"; "Skipper Ireson's Ride" (one of his most characteristic New England ballads); and the tribute to Robert Burns. The poet of New England was always swift to declare his indebtedness to the poet of Scotland and to proclaim his abiding regard for the poems which had first shown him what poetry was.

During these years of the antislavery struggle not only was Whittier's reputation as a poet growing steadily, but the people of the North and of the West were as steadily coming over to his side. Of course we cannot exactly measure the influence of a lyric, but it may be almost irresistible. He was a wise man who was willing to let others make the laws of a people if only he could make their songs. Law is but the condensation of public opinion; and when the ringing stanzas of the antislavery bards and the speeches of the antislavery orators had awakened the conscience of the free states, the end of the evil was nigh. Slavery made a hard fight for its life; but it was slavery itself that Whittier hated, and not the slave owners; and there is no bitterness or rancor in the poems published in 1863 and called "In War Time." Even in his most martial lines there is a Quaker suavity; and of these ballads of the battle years the best known is "Barbara Frietchie," a testimony to the old flag, not a diatribe against those who were then attacking it. And it is known now to be founded on a misapprehension of the facts.

After the final triumph of the cause for which he had battled long and bravely, Whittier turned again to peaceful themes. With the spread of his opinions among the people, his poetry had also become more popular; but no single book of his had ever a widespread and immediate success until "Snow-Bound" appeared in 1866. This poem of New England was seen at once to be worthy of comparison with the "Deserted Village" and with the "Cotter's Saturday Night," with more of the real flavor of the soil than Goldsmith's lines, and with less breadth, but no less elevation, than Burns's. It was received by the reading public as no other poem since Longfellow's "Evangeline" and "Hiawatha." It was so profitable that for the first time in his life—and he was then nearly sixty—Whittier was placed above want.

Only less successful was the "Tent on the Beach," printed the next year, and followed in twelve months by "Among the Hills." Thereafter his position was secure. He had taken his place as one of the poets of America, beside Emerson and Longfellow, beside Lowell and Holmes; and perhaps he was nearer than any of the others to the hearts of New Englanders and of the Westerners whose fathers had gone out from New England. He has been called a Quaker Burns; he could better be called the Burns of New England; and as Burns

Sweet Fern,

The subtle power the perfume found
Not seen nor skill vainly learned
On Grecian shrine or Azyx mound
No censor idly burned.

That power ^{the} hoary wizard knew
The devotee in his frenzied dance,
The Pythian priestess swooning through
The wonder-land of trance.

And Nature holds in wood & field
Her thousand sun-lit causes stale;
To spells of flower & shrub we yield
Against or with our will.

I climbed a hill-path strange & new,
With slow feet, pausing at each turn.
A sudden waft of west wind blew
The breath of the sweet fern.

That fragrance from my vision swept
The alien landscape; in its stead
Up fairer hills of youth I stepped
As light of heart as tread.

wrote for Scotland rather than for the whole of Great Britain, so Whittier wrote for New England rather than for the whole of the United States. It was the scenery of New England he loved best to paint in his ballads; it was the sentiments of New England he voiced in his lyrics; it was his steadfast faith in New England that gave strength to all he wrote.

During the later years of his life Whittier wrote as the mood came, and he gathered his scattered verses into volumes from time to time — "Ballads of New England," for example, in 1870; "Mabel Martin," in 1874; the "King's Missive," in 1881. While no one of these collections repeated the impression made by "Snow-Bound," they strengthened his hold on the hearts of the people. No doubt his old age was made happier by the honor in which he was held. Though his health was not good, he came of sturdy stock, and he outlived the most of his fellow-poets of New England. He saw Longfellow go first, and then Emerson, and finally Lowell, his comrade in the anti-slavery struggle. Long past the allotted three-score years and ten, he printed a final volume of his poems in 1892, under the significant title "At Sundown." At last, early in the fall of 1892, he had a slight paralytic shock, and he died at dawn on September 7, being then in his eighty-fifth year.

It is as a poet that Whittier is held most in honor, but he was also a writer of prose; and in the final collected edition of his works published four years before his death his prose writings fill three of the seven volumes. Of these prose writings the most important is an attempt to reconstruct (in the form of a diary) the life of the first settlers; it is called "Margaret Smith's Journal in the Province of Massachusetts Bay, 1678-79," and it was first published in 1849. As the poet himself said, "Its merit consists mainly in the fact that it presents a tolerably life-like picture of the past, and introduces us familiarly to the hearts and homes of New England in the seventeenth century." The poet also preserved in these three volumes what seemed to him best worth keeping of all his earlier tales and sketches and of his later literary criticisms and personal tributes.

He revised at the same time the more important of his antislavery tracts and articles. As slavery has been abolished forever in this country, the interest of these polemic writings is now mainly historical; they show us how the men felt and thought who were in the thick of the fight for freedom. It is the hard fate of nearly all writing done to aid a cause that it is killed by its own success. Just as soon as the result is attained the articles which helped to bring this about will cease to reward reading. From this hard fate some of Whittier's antislavery and war poetry is saved by its own intrinsic beauty — a beauty lacking in his prose, however. The same neglect has also befallen not a little of the vigorous writing of Benjamin Franklin.

Unlike as Whittier and Franklin were in many respects, they were alike in others. Both of them had the sympathy with the lowly which comes of early experience. Both learned a handicraft, for as a boy Franklin set type and worked a printing press, and Whittier had learnt the trade of slipper-making. To both of them literature was a means, rather than an end in itself. Verse to Whittier, and prose to Franklin, was a weapon to be used in the good fight. In Whittier's verse, as in Franklin's prose, there was the same pithy directness which made their words go home to the hearts of the plain people whom they both understood and represented.

In the fortunate absence of any class distinctions in this country, both Franklin and Whittier were able to develop at will, expanding freely as occasion served, and educating themselves into harmony with broader opportunities. To Franklin was given the larger life and the greater range of usefulness; but Whittier always did with all his might the duty that lay before him.

While Whittier was practical, as becomes a New Englander, he had not the excessive common sense which characterizes Franklin, and he lacked also Franklin's abundant humor. So also his morality was of finer fiber than Franklin's. He was not content, as Franklin was, with showing that honesty is the best policy, and that in the long run vice does not pay; he scourged evil with the wrath of a Hebrew prophet. His views of life were Hebraic rather than Hellenic, for he sought duty, as the Jews did, rather than beauty, as did the Greeks. No one of his poems was written for its own sake, with the exception only of a few of his ballads. They were nearly all intended to further a cause he held dear, or to teach a lesson he thought needful.

For the most part his art was unconscious; he sang because he was a born poet. He was not an artist in verse as Longfellow was; and he was often as careless in rime and as rugged in rhythm as was Emerson. Yet to some of his stanzas there is a lyric lilt that sings itself into the memory; and the best of his ballads have an easy grace of movement. He knew his own deficiencies of training, and he was quick to take advice from those whom he thought better equipped than himself. In this as in all things else he was modest. How modest he really was is perhaps best shown in certain quatrains of the poem he called "My Triumph":—

O living friends who love me !
O dear ones gone above me !
Careless of other fame,
I leave to you my name.

Hide it from idle praises,
Save it from evil phrases ;
Why, when dear lips that spake it
Are dumb, should strangers wake it ?

Let the thick curtain fall ;
I better know than all
How little I have gained,
How vast the unattained.

Sweeter than any sung
My songs that found no tongue ;
Nobler than any fact
My wish that failed of act.

Others shall sing the song,
Others shall right the wrong —
Finish what I begin —
And all I fail of win.

QUESTIONS. — How in his boyhood did Whittier learn to love Nature?

With what kinds of books did he first become acquainted?

Compare his educational advantages with those of other American men of letters.

Tell how he made the acquaintance of the leading antislavery agitator of his day, and in what way the connection was beneficial to him.

What efforts and sacrifices did Whittier make in order to be of service to the cause to which he devoted himself?

Trace the growth of Whittier's literary skill during the twenty years of this period in his life.

Contrast the representative New England poet with the representative American poet.

Characterize the work in three collections of Whittier's poems published between 1843 and 1860.

Discuss Whittier's service in the cause which his book "In War Time" was designed to further.

Compare with the most famous works of Burns and Goldsmith the poem by which Whittier won a degree of literary and financial success surpassing anything which he had known hitherto.

What is the general character of Whittier's later poems?

What can you say of Whittier's reputation as a writer in prose?

Compare Whittier and Franklin.

Make an estimate of Whittier's art.

NOTE. — The only complete edition of Whittier's works is that published by Houghton Mifflin (7 vols.). The Cambridge edition contains all the poems in a single volume. "Snow-Bound," "Mabel Martin," etc., the "Tent on the Beach," etc., can be had as separate numbers of the Riverside Literature series (Houghton Mifflin).

The authoritative biography is that of S. T. Pickard (Houghton Mifflin). G. R. Carpenter wrote the life in the American Men of Letters series (Houghton Mifflin).

For criticism, see Lowell's "Fable for Critics" (Houghton Mifflin); E. C. Stedman in "Poets of America" (Houghton Mifflin); and Barrett Wendell in "Steiniger" (Scribner).

XII OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES was born in Cambridge, Massachusetts, on August 29, 1809. During the Revolution his grandfather had served as a surgeon with the Continental troops; and his father was the author of the "Annals of America," almost the first attempt at a documentary history of this country. He grew to boyhood in Cambridge, often playing under the Washington elm. He was sent to Phillips Academy, Andover; and it was while he was a schoolboy there that he translated the first book of Vergil's "Aeneid" into heroic couplets — the meter used by Pope in his version of Homer's "Iliad." Then he went to Harvard College, where he was graduated in 1829, eight years after Emerson and nine years before Lowell. He wrote prose and verse while he was at Harvard, contributing freely to the college paper; and he delivered the poem at commencement.

Settling down in his native town he began to study law, but his heart was not in his task, and he sought relief in writing verse, mostly comic. That he could be serious upon occasion was shown swiftly the year after his graduation, when it was proposed to break up the frigate "Constitution" — "Old Ironsides" — the victor in the splendid fight with the British ship "Guerrière" in the war of 1812. With the hot indignation of youth against what seemed to him an insult and an outrage upon a national glory, Holmes wrote the fiery lines beginning: —

Ay, tear her tattered ensign down,
Long has it waved on high,
And many an eye has danced to see
That banner in the sky;
Beneath it rung the battle shout,
And burst the cannon's roar;
The meteor of the ocean air
Shall sweep the clouds no more.

This lyric appeal to patriotic feeling was first published in the Boston Advertiser; it was copied all over the country; it was quoted in speeches; it was printed on handbills; and it saved the ship for half a century. "Old Ironsides" was taken to the new Charlestown navy yard, and a few years later she was thoroughly repaired. Even when the day of wooden war ships was past forever, the "Constitution" did not go out of commission for the last time until about fifty years after Holmes had penned his stirring lines.

Apparently the law did not tempt Holmes to perseverance; and before he had been out of college two years he abandoned it finally, to take up the study of medicine — his grandfather's profession. Although he had already written much, and was helping to edit a miscellany, he seems never to have thought of authorship as his calling.

Holmes's Birthplace, Cambridge, Mass.

Having made his choice of a profession, Holmes devoted himself to it — at first in Boston, and then in Europe; making the voyage chiefly that he might study medicine in Paris, where the best instruction was to be obtained at that time. "I was in Europe," he wrote half a century later, "about two years and a half, from April, 1833, to October, 1835. I sailed in the packet ship 'Philadelphia' from New York to Portsmouth, where we arrived after a passage of twenty-four days. . . . I then crossed the Channel to Havre, from which I went to Paris. In the spring and summer of 1834 I made my principal visit to England and Scotland. There were other excursions to the Rhine and to Holland, to Switzerland and to Italy. . . . I returned in the packet-ship 'Utica,' sailing from Havre, and reaching New York after a passage of forty-two days."

He received the degree of Doctor of Medicine in 1836, being then twenty-seven years old; and in that year he also published his first volume of poems. Nothing of Dr. Holmes's has been more popular than the "Last Leaf" contained in this early collection, and none has more richly deserved to please by its rhythmic beauty, and by its exquisite blending of humor and pathos, so sympathetically intertwined that we feel the lonely sadness of the old man even while we are smiling at his quaintness so delicately portrayed. Dr. Holmes was like Bryant (who composed "Thanatopsis" and the "Lines to a Waterfowl" long before he was twenty) in that he early attained his full development as a poet. Although both of them wrote many verses in later life, nothing of theirs excelled these poems of their youth. In their maturity they did not fall off, but neither did they deepen or broaden; and "Thanatopsis" on the one side, and the "Last Leaf" on the other, are as strong and characteristic as anything either poet was ever to write throughout all his long life. What Bryant was, what Holmes was, in his first volume of poems, each was to the end of his career.

To neither of them was literature a livelihood. Bryant was first a lawyer and then a journalist. Holmes was first a practicing physician and then a teacher of medicine. He won three prizes for dissertations on medical themes, and these essays were published together in 1838. In 1839

he was appointed professor of anatomy and physiology at Dartmouth and the next year he married Miss Amelia Lee Jackson. Shortly afterward he resigned the professorship at Dartmouth and resumed practice in Boston. He worked hard at his profession, and he contributed freely to its literature — publishing, for example, in 1842 his trenchant discussion of "Homeopathy and its Kindred Delusions." Then, in 1847, he went back to Harvard, having been appointed professor of anatomy and physiology — a position which he was to hold with great distinction for thirty-five years.

The most of the prose which Dr. Holmes wrote at this period of his life was upon medical topics; and whenever he had anything to say upon other than professional subjects he generally said it in verse. Although he was for a while a frequent lecturer in the lyceums of New England, following in the footsteps of Emerson, his literary reputation until he was nearly fifty was due almost wholly to his poems. This reputation was highest in Massachusetts, and he was the bard of Boston especially, being called upon whenever the three-hilled city needed a copy of verses for an occasion of public interest, a dinner, or a funeral, or the visit of a distinguished foreigner. He always acquitted himself acceptably and often brilliantly; and he rarely refused to provide the few lines of rime appropriate to the event. As he himself humorously put it in one of his later occasional poems: —

I'm a florist in verse, and what would people say
If I came to a banquet without my bouquet?

Then, when Holmes was forty-eight years old, an age at which most men have stiffened themselves into habits, he showed the flexibility of his talent by writing one of the wisest and wittiest prose books in the English language. The Atlantic Monthly was established in the fall of 1857, and Lowell made it a condition of his acting as editor that Dr. Holmes should be a contributor. Therefore it was that the first number of the new magazine contained the opening pages of the "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table," which every reader followed with delight month after month, until at last the book was completed and published by itself in the fall of 1858. Since then it is rather as a writer of prose than as a writer of verse that Dr. Holmes has been most highly esteemed.

The "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table" is a most original book; but it is not especially original in form, for it is not very unlike the "Spectator" of Addison and Steele, wherein a group of characters is described, and their sayings and doings are duly recorded. In the American book the group of characters meets at the early morning meal, and one of them—the Autocrat himself—does most of the talking. The other figures are lightly sketched—some of them are merely suggested; and even at the very end there is but the thinnest thread of a story.

The real originality of Dr. Holmes's work lay deeper than the external form; it lay in the unaffected simplicity and sincerity of the Autocrat's talk. He seemed rather to be chatting with himself than conversing with others; and no such talk had yet fallen from any American lips—none so cheerful with humor, so laden with thought, so mellow with knowledge, so ripe with experience. The reader was borne along by the current of it, unresisting, smiling often, laughing sometimes, and absorbing always, even if unconsciously, broad and high thoughts about life.

So ample a store of humor—and of good humor—had Dr. Holmes, so well filled a reservoir of sense and of common sense, that he had an abundance of material for other volumes like the "Autocrat." In 1860 he published the "Professor at the Breakfast Table," and in 1872 the "Poet at the Breakfast Table," thus completing the trilogy. Although these two later volumes have not all the freshness of their predecessor, they are inferior only to it; they have the same wholesome spirit, the same sanity, the same sunny sagacity. And these are also the qualities which characterize his last volume of prose, "Over the Teacups," issued in 1890, when he was eighty-one years old.

In all these books there is the precious flavor of actual conversation, the table talk of a broad, liberal, thoughtful man, full of fancy and abounding in humor—a man who could chat with countless readers without raising his voice, speaking softly and easily as though he were seated in his own chimney corner.

Various essays and lighter prose pieces, contributed from time to time to the magazines, he gathered together in 1863 under the apt title of "Soundings from the Atlantic." In more than one of these he discussed subjects of everyday life from the point of view of a shrewd and thoughtful physician, avoiding technicalities, and yet using his technical knowledge to help him explain clearly the problem he had in hand.

In 1883, when he made a final revision of all his writings, the best of the papers in this book, with others written afterward, he brought out together as "Pages from an Old Volume of Life." At this time he selected and corrected also a volume of "Medical Essays." Clever as both these books are, with a cleverness of their own, and of a kind no other author possessed, they added but little to Dr. Holmes's reputation. And perhaps it is not unfair to say that this reputation, raised to its highest by the Breakfast Table series, was but little bettered either by the three novels or by the two biographies he wrote after the success of the "Autocrat" tempted him to other ventures in prose.

The three novels were "Elsie Venner," which was published in 1861; the "Guardian Angel," which followed in 1867; and "A Mortal Antipathy," which came last in 1885. All three of these attempts at story-telling are interesting because they are the work of Dr. Holmes. No one of them is a masterpiece of fiction. He had not received the gift of story-telling in as full a proportion as many novelists without a tithe of his ability. In his hands the novel is rarely dramatic; it is rather an elaboration of the essay and the character sketch. The teller of the story is more important than the story itself, and his comments are more interesting than his characters.

Holmes's Summer Residence, Beverly Farms, Mass.

The strange subjects he chose were suggested to him by his study of his profession; and the themes of both "Elsie Venner" and "A Mortal Antipathy" are abnormal. Yet in writing fiction, as in writing verses, Dr. Holmes's extraordinary facility stood him in good stead. His stories, whatever their deficiencies in other respects, have all the shrewdness and the insight which always characterize his handling of human character.

The earlier of the two biographies was the memoir of Motley, published in 1878, within two years after the historian's death. Dr. Holmes was one of Motley's oldest comrades, and he told the story of his friend's life and labors with his accustomed skill, although perhaps his tone was a little too apologetic. In the second biography, the memoir of Emerson, published in 1884, he saw no reason to be on the defensive; and this life is therefore more satisfactory than its predecessor.

Dr. Holmes had, of course, a complete understanding of Emerson's wit, and a full appreciation of Emerson's intelligence, although he had perhaps not so firm a grasp of Emerson's philosophy. Yet the book is delightful. The sage of Concord is presented with the sharpest clearness; he is made real to us by abundant anecdote; his works are analyzed with the utmost acumen; and his career and his character are summed up with absolute sympathy. Both of these biographies were scientifically planned and proportioned, for Dr. Holmes was always the neatest of workmen.

In nothing was he neater than in his characterization of his contemporaries, not only in these two memoirs, but more particularly in the occasional poems which his success as a prose writer did not prevent him from producing. Of Emerson he asked :—

Where in the realm of thought, whose air is song,
Does he, the Buddha of the West, belong?
He seems a wingèd Franklin, sweetly wise,
Born to unlock the secrets of the skies.

Even happier is his summary of Whittier's character :—

So fervid, so simple, so loving, so pure,
We hear but one strain, and our verdict is sure!
Thee cannot elude us—no further we search—
'Tis holy George Herbert cut loose from his church.

And when Lowell went abroad as minister of the United States to Spain, Holmes rimed this pertinent inquiry :—

Do you know whom we send you. Hidalgos of Spain?
Do you know your old friends when you see them again?
Hosea was Sancho! You Dons of Madrid,
But Sancho that wielded the lance of the Cid!

It was the men of Massachusetts that Holmes celebrated in song most freely and most frequently, and although he wrote stirring stanzas of appeal to the whole United States, west and east, when the life of the nation was in danger, it was in the little city of Boston that his spirit resided oftenest. He it was who declared that "Boston State House is the hub of the solar system," and that "you couldn't pry that out of a Boston man if you had the tire of all creation straightened out for a crowbar." He himself was a Bostonian of the strictest sect; he might make fun of the little city, but he loved it all the better for every joke he cracked upon it.

As we turn the pages of the three volumes into which he finally collected all his verse, it is impossible not to be struck by the very large proportion of it which is local in its themes, even if it is not local in its interest. He responded loyally to every call Boston might make upon him, and Boston repaid him with homage and with high praise. It was in Boston that a great public breakfast was given to him in honor of his seventieth birthday. That was in 1879; and three years later he resigned his professorship.

In 1886 he went over to Europe for the second time, almost exactly fifty years after his first visit. He spent the summer in England and France, and he seems to

*And if I should live to be
The last leaf upon the tree
In the Spring,
Let them make of I do know
At the old forsaken bough
Where I long.*

Oliver Wendell Holmes.

have had a very good time indeed, for he kept in age the youthful faculty of enjoyment. From the members of his own profession in England, from the men of letters in London, from the fashionable society of Great Britain, Dr. Holmes received the heartiest welcome; and he was the lion of the London season. He took notes of his travels, recording his observations of men and of manners; and on his return home these jottings were written out, and published the next year as "Our Hundred Days in Europe." It is an easy and a pleasing narrative, rich in the flavor of the author's own personality.

After he had settled down again in Boston, Dr. Holmes continued to write both in prose and in verse. He kept his faculties fully until he had long passed the age of fourscore. His final volume of poems, published in 1888, was appropriately called "Before the Curfew," just as Longfellow and Whittier (also looking to the end) had named their last volumes "In the Harbor" and "At Sundown." Yet after the poems in this collection Holmes wrote those scattered through the pages of "Over the Teacups," which was published in 1890. Four years later he died, on October 7, 1894 — more than sixty years since he had first made himself widely known to his countrymen by the ringing appeal for "Old Ironsides."

Although Holmes had written poems of a wide popularity — "Dorothy Q.," "Grandmother's Story of Bunker Hill Battle," the "Wonderful One-Hoss Shay," and the "Broomstick Train" — probably his prose will endure longer than his verse. For his chief quality was intelligence, and poetry demands rather imagination. His versatility, too, was perhaps more apparent than real, because it was but the result of the dominant intelligence directed into different channels. The force of this intelligence was indisputable; and Holmes could make it masquerade as wisdom and as knowledge, as shrewdness and as wit — and even as poetry. It is seen at its best in the "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table," and that is why that book is better in kind and in degree than any of its fellows.

With this intelligence Holmes had also absolute sanity — and yet he was not intolerant even toward the bores and the cranks. He had abundant humor, and that helped to sweeten his life and to broaden his influence. Perhaps a certain softening of the asperity of religious debate is due to his preaching and to his practice. To the whole United States he set an example of kindness and of gentleness, associated with sagacity and with strength. He himself was an exemplar of the amenities he proclaimed. He was the last to survive of the great New England group of authors, Emerson, Longfellow, Hawthorne, Whittier, Holmes, and Lowell, which followed, and in some ways surpassed, the earlier New York group, Irving, Cooper, and Bryant.

QUESTIONS. — In what ways did Holmes give indication, even before he completed his education, of a decided literary bent?

What events showed the attainment by Holmes of maturity in the two kinds of writing in which he was destined to become famous?

In what department of letters did Holmes first make a reputation?

Describe the series of works by which that reputation was at once shifted in field and enlarged in extent.

Compare Holmes's achievements as a novelist with his work as a biographer.

Compare geographically the sympathies of Holmes with those of Whittier and Longfellow.

What events may be mentioned as showing how he was appreciated both at home and abroad?

Is Holmes's fame most likely to be founded hereafter on his prose or on his poetry? Why?

NOTE. — The only complete edition of Holmes's works is that published by Houghton Mifflin (14 vols.). The Cambridge edition contains all the poems in a single volume. "Grandmother's Story of Bunker Hill Battle," etc., and "My Hunt after the Captain," etc., can be had as separate numbers of the Riverside Literature series.

The authorized biography is that by John T. Morse, Jr. (Houghton Mifflin).

For criticism, see Lowell's "Fable for Critics" (Houghton Mifflin); E. C. Stedman in his "Poets of America" (Houghton Mifflin); T. W. Higginson's "Old Cambridge" (Macmillan); W. D. Howells's "Literary Friends and Acquaintance" (Harper); John Burroughs's "Rereading of Books" in his "Literary Values" (Houghton Mifflin); and H. C. Lodge's "Early Memories" (Scribner).

XIII HENRY DAVID THOREAU

THE little town of Concord has many titles to remembrance. There "the embattled farmers stood and fired the shot heard round the world;" there Emerson wrote "Nature"; there Hawthorne wrote the "Mosses from an Old Manse"; and there was born and lived and died Henry D. Thoreau, an author of even a more marked individuality than either Emerson or Hawthorne. This man was in many ways a true American; he was free from allegiance to Europe; he was possessed by the democratic spirit. On the other hand, he was content with a mere living; he had no wish to make money; he had no desire to get on in the world; he preferred to limit his own wants and not to be a servant to his own possessions.

Henry D. Thoreau was born on July 12, 1817. He went to school in Concord and in Boston; and he entered Harvard College when he was sixteen, graduating in 1837. He seems to have been a conscientious student at college; and he was attracted especially by Greek literature.

Hut on Walden Pond

Through life he retained a liking for Greek modes of thought and of expression.

Thoreau's family made pencils for a living, and this trade Henry mastered easily. He was always swift to pick up a handicraft. He worked also as a carpenter, and occasionally he got a job of surveying.

It was on a piece of land belonging to Emerson, a bit of woodland on the margin of Walden Pond, that Thoreau built himself a shanty in 1845. In this little hut, a mile from any neighbor, he dwelt for two years and two months. He took up with this way of living because he wished to "transact some private business," so he said. What he wanted was solitude in which to write out a book recording his excursion of a week down the Concord and the Merrimac rivers. Then when his business was transacted he went back to civilization — never having been out of touch with it for more than a few days at a time. "I left the woods for as good a reason as I went there," he declared.

"A Week on the Concord and Merrimac Rivers" was published in 1849, the account of a journey in which the narrator talked of himself and of his feelings and of his thoughts quite as much as he spoke of the places he passed and of the people he met. Perhaps because of the strangeness of his frank egotism, the book did not then please the public; and when Thoreau settled finally with the publisher, four years after it had appeared, he took back at least two thirds of the first edition. Without complaint he carried the unsold copies upstairs to the garret and then made the characteristically witty entry in his journal, "I have now a library of nearly nine hundred volumes, over seven hundred of which I wrote myself."

Five years later Thoreau issued his second book, the only other volume of his abundant writing to be printed during his own life. From the journal he had kept while he was living in the hut he drew the material for "Walden." This is the work by which Thoreau is best known now and in which his doctrine of life is declared most clearly. The key to Thoreau's philosophy is to be found in his saying that "a man is rich in proportion to the number of things which he can afford to let alone." "I went to the woods," so he tells us, "because I wished to live deliberately, to front only the essential facts of life, and to see if I could not learn what it had to teach, and not, when I came to die, discover that I had not lived."

Some of the readers of "Walden" did not seize the point of this declaration. Whittier wrote to a friend when the book was just published, that he found it "capital reading," but that "the practical moral of it seems to be that if a man is willing to sink himself into a woodchuck he can live as cheaply as that quadruped; but after all, for me, I prefer walking on two legs." Now this is not quite fair, for Thoreau was not sinking himself into a woodchuck when he tried plain living that he might have high thinking; and "Walden" is a most wholesome warning to all those who are willing to let life itself be smothered out of them by the luxuries they have allowed to become necessities. This is why "Walden" has been called one of the few books of American authorship which it is worth while for an American to read regularly every year.

Thoreau never married; and a man without a wife and without a child can take chances and simplify his life in a way impossible to the man who has given hostages to fortune. Thoreau had little incentive to struggle and to take part in any race for wealth. His wants were always simple and few. If he had but food and warmth and shelter and a book at hand and a friend within an hour's walk he was content. "The cost of a thing," he wrote, "is the amount of what I will call life which is required to be exchanged for it, immediately or in the long run."

In the simplification of his own existence Thoreau was sincere: he followed the bent of his nature. Therefore was Emerson able to write of him after his death, "he was bred to no profession; he never married; he lived alone; he never went to church; he never voted; he refused to pay a tax to the State; he ate no flesh, he drank no wine, he never knew the use of tobacco; and, though a naturalist, he used neither trap nor gun."

He developed consumption, and long before the end came at last he knew that it would come in time. He suffered especially from sleeplessness, but he faced his fate with fortitude. "His patience was unfailing; assuredly he knew not aught save resignation; he did mightily cheer and console those whose strength was less." He died on May 6, 1862, and was buried in the "Sleepy Hollow," where Hawthorne and Emerson have since joined him.

Since his death, volume after volume of his writings has been published, some collected from magazines and others extracted from the journal he had kept for thirty years. Two of these books have a certain unity; one of them is his account of his pioneering adventures in the "Maine Woods," published in 1864; and the other is the somewhat similar record of the several walks he took along the sandy shores of "Cape Cod," published in 1865.

Perhaps it is as a naturalist that Thoreau has the widest reputation. He had an extraordinary familiarity with sylvan life, and the shy creatures of the field and the forest lost some of their shyness with him. He is said to have drawn a woodchuck from its hole by the tail and to have caught a fish in the lake with only his hand. "He knew how to sit immovable, a part of the rock he rested on," so Emerson tells us, "until the bird, the reptile, the fish, which had retired from him, should come back and resume its habits—nay, moved by curiosity, should come to him and watch him." He was a chief of the poet naturalists, and he was not only intimate with nature but friendly. One who knew him said that he talked "about Nature just as if she'd been born and brought up in Concord."

He was always more poet than naturalist, for his observation, interesting as it ever may be, is rarely novel. It is his way of putting what he has seen that takes us rather than any freshness in the observation itself. His sentences have sometimes a Greek perfection; they have the freshness, the sharpness, and the truth which we find so often

Concord Sat. Pm. Oct 14th
1854

Blake,

I have just returned from Plymouth, where I have been detained surveying much longer than I expected.

What do you say to visiting Wachuset next Thursday?

I will start at 7 1/4 A.M. unless there is a prospect of stormy day, go by cars to Westminister, & thence on foot 5 or 6 miles to the Mt top, where I may engage to meet you at (or before) 12. M.

If the weather is unfavorable, I will try again - on Friday, & again on Monday.

If a storm comes on after starting, I will seek you at the tavern in Princeton Center, as soon as circumstances will permit.

I shall expect an answer, & check the bargain.
Yours

Kenny D. Thoreau

in the writings of the Greeks who came early into literature, before everything had been seen and said. Thoreau had a Yankee skill with his fingers, and he could whittle the English language in like manner; he had also a Greek faculty of packing an old truth into an unexpected sentence.

QUESTIONS. — Speak of the contrasting traits of the third in the trio of American authors who contributed to make Concord famous.

Show how certain qualities of Thoreau's style as a writer may be traced to the circumstances of his education.

What is the history of Thoreau's first book? How did his second one grow out of this one?

Mention some of the circumstances which seem to justify Thoreau in his attempts to live up to his theory.

Characterize the work of Thoreau with reference to subject matter and expression.

NOTE. — The only complete edition of Thoreau's works is that published by Houghton Mifflin (11 vols.). The "Succession of Forest Trees," etc., with biographical sketch by Emerson, can be had as a separate number of the Riverside Literature series (Houghton Mifflin).

There is a biography by F. B. Sanborn (Goodspeed).

For criticism, see Emerson's sketch; Lowell in "My Study Windows" (Houghton Mifflin); Mr. T. W. Higginson in "Short Studies of American Authors" (Longmans); R. L. Stevenson in "Familiar Studies of Men and Books" (Scribner); John Burroughs in "Indoor Studies" (Houghton Mifflin).

XIV JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL

THE Lowells have always held an honored place in the local history of New England. One member of the family introduced cotton-spinning into the United States; and for him the town of Lowell in Massachusetts is named. Another left money to found in Boston the course of lectures known as the Lowell Institute. The most distinguished of them all was James Russell Lowell, who was born in 1819 at Cambridge, Massachusetts, on February 22 — the birthday of the most distinguished of all Americans.

His father was a Boston clergyman of high character and fine training, and his mother, who was descended from an Orkney family, had an ardent appreciation of poetry and romance, which she was able to transmit to her children. The boy grew to manhood in Cambridge, then little more than a straggling village. There he went to a dame school:—

Propped on the marsh, a dwelling now, I see,
The humble schoolhouse of my A, B, C,
Where well-drilled urchins, each behind his tire,
Waited in ranks the wished command to fire;
Then all together, when the signal came,
Discharged their a-b abs against the dame,
She, 'mid the volleyed learning, firm and calm,
Patted the furloughed ferule on her palm,
And, to our wonder, could divine at once
Who flashed the pan, and who was downright dunce.

At the age of eight or nine he was sent as a day pupil to a boarding school in Cambridge, where the boys were made to work hard. To the training and to the instructions received at this school Lowell owed much in after life. It happened that two or three of the letters he wrote then to a brother away from home have been kept, and they show that he was already fond of books, often thinking about them and always glad to get them. In one letter written before he was ten he tells his brother that their mother has just given him three volumes of Scott's "Tales of a Grandfather," and he declares "I have got quite a library."

At the age of fifteen he entered Harvard. This was in 1834, and in 1836 Longfellow came to the college to teach literature, succeeding Ticknor, the historian of Spanish literature—as Lowell was to succeed Longfellow a score of years later. At Harvard Lowell was not a diligent student ; he liked better to read what interested him than to master the tasks set before him by the college authorities. Spenser was already a favorite poet of his, and he seems early to have entered on the study of Dante, which was to be a life-long pleasure to him.

He began to rime himself, and in his junior year he wrote the anniversary poem. He was made editor of the college magazine in his senior year. He appears to have been popular with his classmates and he was chosen to write the class poem. But he had so neglected certain of the prescribed studies of the college that he was suspended for several months, and as the term of suspension extended over class-day, he was not able himself to deliver the poem he had written. He had it printed for his companions, although he held it in too slight esteem ever to include it among the poems of his maturity.

After his graduation he thought of entering the Divinity School, but he decided at last to study law. Although he was on the very verge of giving it up twenty times, he persevered and received his degree of Bachelor of Laws in 1840. He opened an office in Boston, but it is doubtful whether he ever had even that first client whom he was afterward to describe in a humorous sketch. With no great liking for the law as a means of livelihood, he finally abandoned it, as Holmes had done only a few years earlier.

Lowell had become engaged to Miss Maria White, who was to influence the whole course of his life. The first result of his happy love was the publication in 1841 of a volume of poems, some of which had been printed already in the magazines, and others were hasty and crude rimes which he kept out of later editions of his poems — just as Whittier rejected his own early verses. Lowell was barely twenty-two when this book appeared, but there was more than one poem in it which gave high promise of his future. In addition to his ability, he had a deep love for letters; and this it was which led him a year later to start a monthly magazine. In his ardor and in his inexperience he made this periodical too exclusively literary to attain a wide popularity; and, unfortunately, after three numbers it came to an end suddenly, leaving its projectors in debt.

In his class poem Lowell had shown himself lacking in sympathy with the Transcendentalists and with the Abolitionists; and until he met Miss White his interests and his ambitions were almost wholly literary. Under her influence his higher nature developed and he came to have a strong feeling for the fellow human beings who were held in bondage. He swiftly saw that in real life there were causes to be fought far better worth the struggle than any mere craving for personal fame. His love for letters never lessened, but it was linked thereafter to the love for human freedom.

He was married at last in 1844, in which year he brought out a revised edition of his poems. A few months later he gathered from the magazines certain prose criticisms, chiefly about the older English poets — criticisms which he thought so lightly of in later years that he did not allow them to be included in his collected works. And about this time he was a frequent contributor to the Pennsylvania Freeman, the antislavery journal formerly edited by Whittier.

Settled at Cambridge in Elmwood (the beautiful old house where he had been born), happily married, supporting himself by his writings and enlisted in the service of a cause which he had taken to heart, Lowell was able to conquer his native indolence. He undertook to contribute every week, either in prose or in verse, to one of the ablest of the antislavery journals; and he kept this agreement for nearly four years, from 1846 to 1850. These were four years of unrest and excitement throughout the world; and here in the United States the discussion over slavery became more and more acute.

Elmwood

Chiefly to gain an increase of territory for the expansion of slavery, this country was involved in a war with Mexico over the admission of Texas. Although it is easy enough now to see that without the new lands the proper expansion of the United States was not possible, it was hard to foresee this then. What was obvious at that time was that both the motives and the methods of those who were urging us into the Mexican war were apparently unworthy. This is what Lowell discerned with his usual keenness; and no one attacked those responsible for the Mexican war more sharply than he or more effectively.

The weapon he chose was satiric verse written in the homely dialect of the New England farmer. With pungent humor and in stanzas that had a sharp flavor of the soil, "Hosea Biglow" made fun of the attempts to rouse his fellow-citizens to military fervor. His stinging lines, which scorched themselves into the memory, were accompanied by the prose comments of "Parson Wilbur," who represented the other side of the New England character. While the clergyman was glad to air his culture and his classics, he served admirably to set off the simple frankness of the Yankee youth.

That the lyrics of Hosea should linger in the ears of those who heard them, Lowell took care to give to each a swinging rhythm and often also a catching refrain. When at last the scattered "Biglow Papers" were collected into a volume in 1848, the author, just to show that the New England dialect was serviceable for other things than satire, added to the book a Yankee idyl, "The Courtin'," one of the most beautifully natural love episodes in all English poetry.

During these same years of political turmoil while he was writing the "Biglow Papers" one after another, Lowell produced another satire of a very different kind, the "Fable for Critics," which was also published in 1848; it was purely literary in its outlook; it was a consideration in verse of the state of American literature at the end of the first half of the nineteenth century. It contained a gallery of portraits of the American authors then prominent; and in every portrait the characteristic features of the original were seized with swift insight and reproduced with sharp vigor.

It is a proof of Lowell's excellence of judgment and of his independence of attitude, that the opinions he expressed about the leading American authors of that time coincide closely with that on which the best criticism is now agreed sixty years later. And the rattling lines of the poem are as readable now as when they were first written, with their scattering fire of verbal jokes, of ingenious rimes, and of personal witticisms. As the "Biglow Papers" is the firmest and the finest political satire yet written in the United States, so the "Fable for Critics" is the clearest and most truthful literary satire.

Nor did these two satires withdraw him wholly from the higher poetry on which his heart was set. And in this same year, 1848, he sent forth also the "Vision of Sir Launfal," his first attempt at telling a story in verse. It is the best of all his serious poems; perhaps loftier in conception and more careful in execution. His habit then, as always, was to brood over the subject he wished to treat in verse, to fill himself with it, to work himself up to a white heat over it, and finally to write it out at a single sitting if possible. He rarely revised and his verse lacked finish and polish, though it never wanted force. It was at this time that he told Longfellow he meant to give up poetry because he could "not write slowly enough."

His poetry also suffered from another failing of his. He was not content to set forth beauty only and to let the reader discover a moral for himself. Like Longfellow sometimes and like Whittier often, Lowell insisted unduly on the burden of his song. And he knew his own defect and wrote later in life, "I shall never be a poet till I get out of the pulpit, and New England was all meetinghouse when I was growing up." In the "Fable for Critics" (which was published without his own name as author, and in which he thought it best to include himself among the poets satirized) he thus judges his own efforts:—

There is Lowell, who's striving Parnassus to climb—
With a whole bale of isms tied together with rime;
He might get on alone, spite of brambles and boulders,
But he can't with that bundle he has on his shoulders;
The top of the hill he will ne'er come nigh reaching Till he learns the distinction 'twixt singing and preaching;
His lyre has some chords that would ring pretty well,
But he'd rather by half make a drum of the shell,
And rattle away till he's old as Methusalem,
At the head of a march to the last new Jerusalem.

During these years when Lowell was making his way as a poet and when he was happy in his work, the health of his wife was slowly fading. For her sake they went to Europe in 1851, returning the following year. In spite of all that could be done for her she died in October, 1853. As it happened, a daughter was born to Longfellow on the day of the death of Lowell's wife; and in the lovely poem of the "Two Angels" the elder poet tried to console the younger.

Angels of Life and Death alike are His;
Without His leave they pass no threshold o'er:
Who, then, would wish or dare, believing this,
Against His messengers to shut the door?

In the fall of 1854 Lowell delivered a series of lectures on the English poets. These addresses, given at the Lowell Institute in Boston, revealed all the richness and strength of his culture and displayed the resources of his critical faculty. They proved that he was the American critic who had at once the keenest insight and the widest equipment. Almost immediately after he had made these discourses and entirely without his own solicitation he was offered the professorship of modern languages at Harvard, which Longfellow had just resigned. He accepted this arduous and honorable position in the oldest American university, and he was allowed two years' leave of absence to spend in Europe in study. So it was in the spring of 1857 that Lowell became a professor of Harvard — just ten years after Dr. Holmes had begun his own connection with that institution.

With Dr. Holmes he was soon brought into closer contact. A new American magazine was planned, to contain contributions more particularly from the New England group of writers; and the editorship was offered to Lowell. The first number of the Atlantic which appeared in 1857 contained the opening paper of the "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table"; and for four years Lowell edited this magazine, toiling faithfully, writing abundantly himself, generally on political themes, and encouraging new writers of ability. After he resigned the editorship of the Atlantic he became for a while one of the conductors of the North American Review, the venerable quarterly to which Bryant had contributed "Thanatopsis" nearly half a century before. Under the title of "Fireside Travels" he published in 1864 a volume of his prose papers collected chiefly from the magazines.

But long before this peaceful prose appeared, Lowell had been moved again to express in verse his feelings and his thoughts on the times. "Hosea Biglow" had come into being during the Mexican war; and it was the Civil War which evoked him once more. Love of country was the core of Lowell's character and the outbreak of the struggle between the states stirred his nature to its depths.

The second series of the "Biglow Papers," written at intervals during the war, met with even wider popular approval than the first series; and certainly the stinging stanzas of "Jonathan to John" are unsurpassed in all English satire. When this second series of the "Biglow Papers" was collected into a volume in 1867 Lowell prefixed to it a consideration of the past, the present, and the future of the English language in America—a paper which had scholarship equal to its humor and a sweetness of temper equal to both—a paper to be read by all who want to understand how it is that we Americans own a whole and undivided half of the English language.

In 1869 Lowell made a collection of his graver verse, "Under the Willows," in which he included his more serious poems of the war. Among them were the thrilling lines of the "Washers of the Shroud," and the noble and lofty ode recited at the Harvard Commemoration of those of her students who had fallen in battle for the right—the ode in which the poet set forth in imperishable phrase the true character of Abraham Lincoln. And in this same year Lowell also put forth the longest of his single poems, the "Cathedral," a work in which the parts are greater than the whole, and which is rather Gothic than Greek in conception and execution. It is elevated in its purpose, and yet there is an occasional obtrusion of prankish humor not unlike the grotesque faces which grin down on the visitor to the actual cathedral at Chartres.

From the many critical papers which he had written, chiefly for the periodicals he had edited, and which were often founded on courses of college lectures, Lowell made a first choice in 1870, and published "Among my Books," a volume of prose essays in criticism. The year after, another volume appeared called "My Study Windows"; and a few years later came yet another, the second series of "Among my Books." In the final edition of his writings the contents of these three volumes has been rearranged somewhat. Among them were the criticisms of the great poets Dante, Spenser, Shakspeare, Milton, Wordsworth; cordial papers on Lowell's own favorites, Dryden, Lessing, and Keats; and pungent yet mellow essays "On a Certain Condescension in Foreigners," on "My Garden Acquaintance," and on "A Good Word for Winter."

As these volumes proved, Lowell was the foremost of all American critics of literature. He had knowledge and wisdom, culture and sagacity. His writing has the leisurely amplitude of the scholar and the sharp thrust of the wit. The gift of the winged phrase was his; and no man of our time ever packed truth oftener into an epigram. He had also the wide and deep acquaintance with literature which is the best backbone of criticism. So fine was his scholarship, and so broad his cultivation, that he was wholly devoid of petty pedantries; he had too sure a sense of proportion to confuse trifling facts with truths of real importance.

Lowell had enjoyed heartily his own frequent reading of the works of the great authors he wrote about, and he was able to convey some of this enjoyment to his own readers, and to explain to them the reasons for his liking. His favorite of all was the mighty Florentine poet Dante, whom he steadily studied from early life. Indeed, the advice he gave to young men seeking culture was to find the great writer whom they most appreciated and to give themselves to the constant perusal of this great writer, growing up to him slowly and discovering gradually that to understand him adequately would force them sooner or later to learn many of the things best worth learning.

When the time came to celebrate the centenary of the chief events of the Revolution, Lowell was the poet to whom the American people turned to have their thoughts and their sentiments voiced for them in verse; and Lowell delivered an ode at the centenary of the fight at Concord Bridge, and another at the centenary of Washington's taking command of the American army at Cambridge just before the siege of Boston, and a third on the Fourth of July, 1876. In this same year these "Three Memorial Poems" were published together in a single volume.

The next year he was called to the service of the country whose foundation he had been celebrating in song. He was sent in 1877 as American Minister to Spain, where another man of letters, Washington Irving, had preceded him half a century before. In 1880 he was transferred from Madrid to London.

No American minister ever made himself more welcome among a foreign people than Lowell made himself among the British. And his popularity was not due to any attempt to please their prejudices; Lowell abated not a jot or tittle of his Americanism — rather on occasion did he accentuate it. In sending him to Great Britain the United States sent the best we had. Our kin across the sea were quick to understand the opportunity offered to them; and by their request Lowell delivered in England many public addresses, some of them formal orations, while others were but offhand after dinner speeches. But whatever the occasion, Lowell was equal to it, never more amply than when he went to Birmingham to make an exposition of the theory and practice of "Democracy" in America. Nowhere more plainly than in England was Lowell's Americanism seen to be ingrained. With him patriotism was almost a passion.

He remained in England three years and then returned home, and Dr. Holmes greeted him with a copy of verses, in which he asked, —

By what enchantments, what alluring arts,
Our truthful James led captive British hearts, —
Whether his shrewdness made their statesmen halt,
Or if his learning found their dons at fault,
Or if his virtue was a strange surprise,
Or if his wit flung sawdust in their eyes, —
Like honest Yankees we can simply guess;
But that he did it, all must needs confess.
England herself without a blush may claim
Her only conqueror since the Norman came.

After his return to his native land Lowell revised the most important of the many addresses he had delivered in England, and in 1886 he published them in a single volume under the title of the full and rich discourse in which he had declared the better side of "Democracy." Here at home Lowell never hesitated to point out the shortcomings of his countrymen, their errors and their blunders; but when he was abroad it was on their merits only that he was willing to dwell. In the address on "Democracy" he had told the British all that was best in our social system; and when he came home he made haste to tell us Americans how we must labor to remove all that is evil in our social system. He did this in a speech on the "Independent in Politics," and this address was included in a volume of "Political Essays" published in 1888.

In this same year appeared also his last volume of poetry, "Heartsease and Rue." In verse as in prose, Lowell was nearly always an improviser, pouring forth suddenly in a single powerful jet all that he had been slowly bringing to a white heat within him. He lacked the patient

God of our fathers, Thou who wast
Art, & shalt be when the eye-wise who ^{flout} ~~doubt~~
Thy secret presence shall be lost
In the great light that dazzes them to doubt,
We, sprung from loins of stalwart men
Whose strength was in their trust
That Thou wouldst make thy dwelling in their fast
And walk with them a fellow-citizen
Who build a city of the just,
We, who believe Life's basis rest
Beyond the probe of chemic test,
Still, like our fathers, feel thee near
In that, while lasts the immutable decree,
The land to Human Nature dear
Shall not be unbelov'd of Thee.

toil of the artist who should not only file and polish, but if need be recast altogether. He worked too hastily for perfection of finish. The "Biglow Papers" have a tunefulness and a rhythmic swing lacking to most of his more serious poems. Some of these later verses have lightness and ease; and they have also their share of the humorous shrewdness and the witty pith for which the "Biglow Papers" are unsurpassed in all English literature.

As Lowell drew near to the allotted limit of threescore years and ten he was everywhere recognized as one of the foremost citizens of the republic, a type of the character most needed in American public life — the man of broad culture, having a solid understanding of his fellow-men and a deep love of his country. Probably the later years of his life were made pleasanter by this atmosphere of appreciation. At last his health failed and he died on August 12, 1891, being then seventy-two years old.

Of the New England group of American authors, Lowell, although survived by both Whittier and Holmes, was the youngest except Parkman. All of these except Hawthorne and Parkman were poets, and the fame of Longfellow and Whittier may be said to be due wholly to their poetry. Lowell, like Emerson, was a poet also, but his work in prose was at least equal in value to his work in verse. He was the literary critic of the group, as Hawthorne was the story-teller.

QUESTIONS. — What are the points of interest in Lowell's life to the time of his marriage?

What was his wife's influence in shaping his future career?

Upon what occasion and with what weapons did Lowell make his first appearance in the political arena?

In what striking literary work did he show the soundness of his literary judgment?

From what two failings did Lowell's poetry suffer?

In what work did Lowell present an interesting mixture of linguistic knowledge and poetical satire?

What is the character of the volume in which he included a poem the parts of which are said to be greater than the whole?

Discuss the qualities displayed by Lowell in the collections of essays published in the '70's.

To what positions was Lowell appointed and how did he serve in these posts?

Tell about Lowell's career after his return to America.

NOTE. — The complete edition of Lowell's works is that published by Houghton Mifflin (11 vols.). The Cambridge edition contains all the poems in a single volume. "Under the Old Elm," etc., the "Vision of Sir Launfal," etc., and "Books and Libraries," etc., can be had as separate numbers of the Riverside Literature series (Houghton Mifflin).

There are biographies by F. H. Underwood and H. E. Scudder (Houghton Mifflin). The "Correspondence," edited by C. E. Norton (Harper, 2 vols.) is almost an autobiography. There is a life by E. E. Hale, Jr., in the Beacon Biographies (Small Maynard) and one by Ferris Greenslet in the American Men of Letters series (Houghton Mifflin).

For criticism, see E. C. Stedman in "Poets of America" (Houghton Mifflin); Barrett Wendell in "Stelligeri" (Scribner); Henry James in "Essays in London" (Harper); E. E. Hale's "James Russell Lowell and his Friends" (Houghton Mifflin); T. W. Higginson's "Old Cambridge" (Macmillan); W. D. Howells's "Literary Friends and Acquaintance" (Harper); and W. C. Brownell's "American Prose Masters" (Scribner).

XV FRANCIS PARKMAN

It is not often that a man who forms a high purpose in his youth loyally devotes his whole life to its accomplishment, and finally survives just long enough to see that it is achieved. This, however, is what Francis Parkman did. When he was still but a boy in college he resolved to tell the story of the long struggle between the French and the English for the possession of North America. To this task he gave himself his whole life long; and when the work was done at last, after the unhasting labor of nearly half a century, he was ready to die, being then about seventy years of age. And this singular success was won in the face of difficulties which would have discouraged any man who had not very unusual firmness of fiber.

Francis Parkman was born in Boston on September 16, 1823. He belonged to what Dr. Holmes called the "Brahmin caste of New England," that is to say, his ancestors had been men of education and character generation after generation. The family had endowed two professorships at Harvard College.

In his boyhood Parkman's health was not robust ; and he was sent to live in the country on the edge of the wild tract known as Middlesex Fells. Here he spent four years in intimate acquaintance with the forest. Then after proper schooling he entered Harvard College ; and it was when he was a sophomore that he formed the purpose of writing the history of the French and Indian War—a design which easily expanded later into that of telling the story of the whole conflict between the French and the English in North America. And from the day when this project first took shape in the mind of the young man at college, everything he did afterwards was made to contribute to its fulfillment.

In one college vacation he camped and canoed in the backwoods of Maine, and in another he was able to explore all the recesses of Lake George and Lake Champlain. Even an accident in the gymnasium happened to help on his preparation for his work, because he made a voyage of recovery to Europe, and in Rome he lodged for a while in a monastery, thus getting to know more about the character and the training of the self-sacrificing priests whose devotion to duty he had afterward to chronicle. On his return home he rejoined his class and was graduated in 1844. For two years he seems to have studied law with more or less persistence. As it happened, his grandfather had made a fortune; and there was therefore no immediate pressure on Parkman to set about earning his own living.

Then he took a long journey to help fit himself for the task before him. He needed to know the Indians and to understand their enigmatic character. He wanted also to study the frontiersmen, whose ways differ but little from those of their forefathers three or four generations ago, since like conditions are sure to produce men of like characteristics. In the time of the French and Indian War the red savage and the white borderer had been both of them close to the Atlantic coast; but toward the middle of the nineteenth century the advance of civilization had pressed them back over the Alleghanies and across the Mississippi. It was to the Rocky Mountains that Parkman went in 1846 with a friend, spending a summer with the Sioux in their camps among the Black Hills of Dakota and on the vast tableland through which the Platte River twists itself languidly.

He and his friend lived with the Indians, sharing their rough fare and studying their ways and their customs, and getting an insight into their character not to be had in any other manner. They underwent also the hardships of the Indians, the toils, the privations, the exposure; and Parkman was so enfeebled by these that he never regained his strength. While with the Indians he was so ill that he had to be lifted into his saddle, and it was only because his will was firm enough to give him the mastery even over pain that he was able to get back to civilization. And when at last he made his way home he was permanently disabled; and for three years he was unable to use his eyes.

To the friend who had been with him in these Western wanderings he dictated a record of their experiences. This, after being printed in a magazine, was published in 1849 in a volume known now as the "Oregon Trail." It is one of the very best books of outdoor adventure ever written and one of the most valuable, for it has preserved for us the outward appearance of a state of things long since vanished forever. From it the reader can gain an understanding of the red men and of their white neighbors, and a knowledge of the motives which rule their conduct, unobtainable from any other single book. It helps us to explain to ourselves the unending series of wars between the white race and the red, ever since the men of our stock first set foot on the soil which the Indian claimed for his own. It enables us to see for ourselves that the Indian Cooper presented in his novels is not unlike the real Indian, but that the real Indian had another side to him than the side Cooper chose to depict.

His inherited means relieved Parkman from the necessity of writing for money, and it allowed him to undertake a long task not likely to pay him a full pecuniary reward even at the end. To many a young man with broken health this money might have been merely a temptation to luxurious idleness; to many another it would have afforded an excuse for toying with literature as an amateur only; to Parkman it yielded the opportunity for strenuous labor. Without his inherited wealth it would have been impossible for Parkman to have accomplished anything, since he was dependent on others for the things which other authors are able to do for themselves.

For forty years and more he led what he himself called a life of "repressed activity." His eyes had failed him; and he was aware that his mind might fail him also if he worked it hard. There were years when he was not allowed to work at all. There were years when he was able to read only for one minute at a time, resting the next minute and reading again the third and so on for half an hour, and when three or four of these broken half hours were all the reading he was allowed during the day. Of course he could not write; and all his histories were dictated to a member of his family, who prepared them for the press.

The first book he composed after the publication of the Parkman's Residence, Boston, Mass.

"Oregon Trail" was an account of the cleverly planned Indian rising which in 1763 came so near to undoing the English victories over the French. This "History of the Conspiracy of Pontiac," published in 1851, is really a supplement to the main history of the struggle of the French and English for North America. Perhaps Parkman wrote it first because he was then fresh from actual contact with the Indians, and perhaps because he wished to try his 'prentice hand at a less important book before beginning his great history.

It is almost inconceivable that he was able to accomplish anything under the difficulties which held him fast; but he devised in time a method of work which enabled him to overcome them finally. He made it a point always to see for himself the scene of every event he had to describe; and his descriptions of scenery are always lucid and graphic, sympathetic and picturesque. He collected all the books bearing in any way on the matter he had in hand, all histories, biographies, journals, accounts of all kinds. He had copies made for him of all the unprinted documents, private letters, official reports, and public statements, wherever these might be, in the libraries of America or in the government collections of France and Great Britain or in the personal archives of old families. He had the aid of competent assistants who read all the documents aloud to him twice, once that he might form in his own mind an outline of the story, and a second time that he might secure the salient details. As these documents were read he took notes or he had them taken.

Thus slowly, laboriously, he was able to piece together the story he wanted to tell. Probably the apparent disadvantage of the method he had to adopt was a real advantage, for it forced him to digest his materials absolutely, to think out to the end before he started on the beginning, to carry in his head the entire story complete in all its parts and proportioned properly. But though the result repaid him, the limitations under which he labored were very severe.

A friend has described him as always "waiting for moments of health as his greatest blessing, glad to do a little, and always thankful when he could do more. He could not go into society, because it consumed his strength. He could see but few friends in his own house, for the same reason. His own family had to shield him from excitements. It was like fighting destiny to do anything, and yet month by month the noiseless fabric grew, and book after book was published, until his plan was completed."

The general title which he gave finally to his great work was "France and England in North America." The successive seven books were each complete in themselves and yet all fitted together to make a compact whole. They were not published in a strictly chronological order, because as Parkman grew in years he wished at least to leave behind him the most important divisions of the work; but he lived to pick up all the parts passed over.

The first to appear was the volume on the "Pioneers of France in the New World," which is the opening of the series and which was published in 1865. In 1867 came the second book, on the "Jesuits in North America in the Seventeenth Century," a narrative of heroic and fruitless endeavor, followed two years later by "La Salle; and the Discovery of the Great West." Then there was an interval of five years before the book on the "Old Régime in Canada" appeared in 1874. Three years later came "Count Frontenac and New France under Louis XIV." The two books which conclude the series, and which were published in reverse order, are "A Half Century of Conflict," issued in 1892, and "Montcalm and Wolfe," issued in 1884.

No finer subject could any historian have than this conflict of France and England for the possession of North America; and no finer history has been written by any man of our time. It has the twofold merit that it can be read with pleasure and it can be relied on with confidence. Parkman first made himself master of all the facts and then

Dear Sir.

To the best of my recollection the Journal of Nathaniel Woodhull was printed either in the publications of the Essex Institute or in the old Historical Magazine. It is not of great value, and I have searched in vain for the reference to it among my notes, which are at present in some disorder.

Yours sincerely
F. Parkman

Yours
2 Dec '84

he selected those which were essential and set them forth in most interesting fashion.

In his reliance on research he was rigidly scientific; in his presentation of the results of his research he was unfailingly artistic. He sought truth always, and having found it he tried to present it as beauty also. For every fact, every allusion, every picturesque touch, he could give his authority; but he did not heap up his investigations crudely and make his readers form impressions of their own. He showed to the world the carved statue perfect in its strength and in its grace; he did not draw attention to the models he used, to the rough block he had hewn, or to the scattered chips of the workshop.

Parkman was happily married in 1852; but he lost his wife in 1858, after which he lived with his sister in Boston, either in the center of the city or in its outskirts on the shore of Jamaica Pond. In this latter place he was able to be outdoors and to become expert as a plant-grower, even originating new species. He wrote a book about roses; and for a year or two he was professor of horticulture at Harvard. He used to say that his garden had saved his life.

After the completion of his history in 1892 he began at once the revision of the earliest volumes in the light of his later labors. In this pleasant task he was engaged when he died on September 8, 1893. His work was done and he could die happy.

After his death Holmes summed up his labors in a poem of which these stanzas may be quoted here:—

He told the red man's story; far and wide

He searched the unwritten records of his race;

He sat a listener at the Sachem's side,

He tracked the hunter through his wildwood chase.

High o'er his head the soaring eagle screamed ;
The wolf's long howl rang nightly ; through the vale
Tramped the lone bear ; the panther's eyeballs gleamed ;
The bison's gallop thundered on the gale.

Soon o'er the horizon rose the cloud of strife—
Two proud, strong nations battling for the prize—
Which swarming host should mold a nation's life,
Which royal banner flout the western skies.

Long raged the conflict ; on the crimson sod
Native and alien joined their hosts in vain ;
The lilies withered where the Lion trod,
Till Peace lay panting on the ravaged plain.

QUESTIONS.—What is there remarkable about the life and works of Parkman ?

How was the usual history of a well-born Boston boy varied in his case ?

Describe the events of the long journey which Parkman took in order to help fit himself for the task which he had already set before him.

Compare the subject of Parkman's first book, as it was presented by him, with the same theme as it was pictured by an earlier American novelist.

Describe the methods by which alone Parkman was enabled to complete his great undertaking.

Describe the work that gives to Parkman a valid claim to be ranked with the foremost historians in the nineteenth century.

How was his work summed up by Holmes ?

NOTE.—The complete edition of Parkman's works is that published by Little Brown (13 vols.). There are various cheap editions of the "Oregon Trail."

Charles H. Farnham has written Parkman's biography (Little Brown). For a fragment of autobiography see the Harvard Graduates' Magazine for May, 1895.

For criticism, see Lowell in the Century for November, 1892 ; John Fiske in his "A Century of Science" (Houghton Mifflin) ; and Theodore Roosevelt in the Independent for November 24, 1892.

XVI DANIEL WEBSTER AND ABRAHAM LINCOLN

WHILE most of the writers whose works have been considered were men who chose literature as a career and as a livelihood, there were also other men not professional authors whose writing sometimes attained a high level of literary merit because they were able to bestow upon what they said or upon what they wrote the twin qualities of substance and of style. A letter or a speech may achieve its immediate purpose if it possesses the necessary simplicity, directness, and force, if the writer or the speaker conveys his thought so as to produce satisfactorily the impression he desires to produce. But now and again a letter or a speech may be so striking in its theme, so elevated in its thought, so nobly phrased, that it transcends its temporary object and survives the occasion which called it forth.

Benjamin Franklin, for example, never thought of himself as an author, and he never published a book. But he was so individual in his personality, he was so interesting in his expression, he was so clear and captivating in his style, that his letters to his friends and his casual papers composed for a temporary purpose have permanent value. They are read with pleasure and with profit to-day, more than a century after his death. He was an author by accident, so to speak,—not moved by the customary desire of men of letters for fame or for fortune. Many of his contemporaries among the leaders of the Revolution also have left writings which were intended only to aid in the struggle for independence and for stable government, but which deserve recognition as contributions to American literature.

Not a few of the early state papers of our country have literary merit in a high degree. The Declaration of Independence, for example, written by Thomas Jefferson (1743-1826), afterward President of the United States, most skillfully combines compact logic and brilliant rhetoric. It is a lofty and noble utterance of the sentiments of the people at a moment of crisis; and it is unsurpassed by any of the historical documents of any other people. The Constitution of the United States, which was the result of the associated wisdom of the foremost statesmen of the time, owes much of its clarity and of its force to Gouverneur Morris (1752-1816), who was charged with the revision of its style and who was responsible for its simple and vigorous English.

Thomas Jefferson

In arousing the public spirit which enabled us to achieve our independence, no single effort was perhaps more effective than an appeal called "Common Sense," written by Thomas Paine (1737-1809) and published in 1776; and the author followed it up with the successive issues of a periodical, the Crisis, which were also useful to the patriotic cause.

After the revolution was accomplished and after the necessity was felt for a firm and yet flexible form of government, the proposed constitution might not have been adopted if it had not been explained and defended by a series of papers published from time to time in 1787-1788 under the general title of the Federalist. These are, perhaps, the ablest political essays in the English language ; and they are like some of the great speeches of Burke, in that they were intended to effect an immediate purpose only and yet have served ever since as a perpetual storehouse of political wisdom. They were written by Alexander Hamilton (1757-1804), John Jay (1745-1829), and James Madison (1751-1836). After the adoption of the constitution Hamilton became Secretary of the Treasury under Washington, whom he afterwards aided in preparing the "Farewell Address." Jay was the first Chief Justice of the Supreme Court ; and Madison was the fourth President of the United States.

Alexander Hamilton

Nearer to us are two other American statesmen who demand consideration as men of letters, because of the permanent value of their occasional addresses. These two statesmen are Daniel Webster and Abraham Lincoln, — the former a man of New England and the latter a man of the Middle West. Webster had in his youth the advantage of college training ; but Lincoln had to give himself his own education after he had grown to manhood. Different as they were in their stock, in their upbringing, in their development, in their characters, they were alike in possessing a single-hearted devotion to the Union. And to these two men more than to any others do we owe it that the United States are still united and that the government established by Washington, Hamilton, Jefferson, still survives in its integrity.

Daniel Webster was born in 1782, on January 18, and he died in 1852, on October 24. In the year of his birth Great Britain acknowledged the independence of the United States; and in the year of his death Mrs. Stowe published "Uncle Tom's Cabin," which aroused an increasing animosity toward slavery and which was in itself evidence that an irrepressible conflict was impending between the defenders and the opponents of slavery. For more than half of his threescore years and ten Webster was the most important figure in American public life.

Daniel Webster

Born in New Hampshire, he was graduated from Dartmouth College in 1801. Admitted to the bar, he practiced law in his native state until he was thirty-five; and then, in 1817, in the ripe maturity of his ability as an advocate, he removed to Boston. In 1822 Boston sent him to Congress; and in 1827 Massachusetts sent him to the Senate of the United States, where he was soon recognized as its dominant personality. In 1841 and again in 1850 he served as Secretary of State; and in this office he was able to negotiate a treaty with Great Britain which settled once for all most of the questions then in dispute between the British and the American peoples. Conscious of his services and of his fitness for the position, Webster naturally desired an election to the Presidency; and the failure to attain this long-sought honor was to him a bitter disappointment.

For thirty years his leadership of the American bar was indisputable, and he was equally successful in civil and in criminal cases. He was as adroit in winning the verdict of a jury in a murder trial as he was ingenious in gaining a decision upon a constitutional question from the Supreme Court of the United States. But effective as was his eloquence in the courtroom, it was not there as far-reaching as it was in senatorial debate or in commemorative addresses.

He delivered two orations at Bunker Hill, the first in 1825, at the laying of the cornerstone of the monument, and the second in 1843, when the towering memorial had been at last completed. In these two great addresses Webster expressed simply and superbly the main idea which always animated his appeals to the American people. This main idea can be stated briefly in his own phrase — "Liberty and Union, now and forever, one and inseparable." He knew the necessity for dwelling on this, as he had seen in his youth a separatist movement in Massachusetts during Jefferson's administration and as he had later opposed the nullification movement in South Carolina during Jackson's administration. The same idea was at the core of his mightiest effort, the "Reply to Hayne," delivered in the Senate in 1830. Iterated and reiterated by Webster, year after year, in speech after speech, this idea sank into the consciousness of the growing generations and helped to bring about the intense devotion to the Union which resulted in its preservation after four years of civil war. And it was by this insistence upon the necessity of our remaining a single nation, and by thus arousing an abiding patriotism, that Webster made the difficult task of Lincoln a little less difficult.

For oratory Webster was marvelously endowed by nature, not only with the needed mental powers, but also with the supporting physical presence. Emerson said that "Webster had a natural ascendancy of aspect and carriage. . . . His countenance, his figure, and his manners were all in so grand a style, that he was, without an effort, as superior to his most eminent rivals as they were to the humblest." Although he was not above medium height, his massive person made him seem a giant. His eyes were fiery beneath his cavernous brow. His voice was a wonderful instrument, which he used with wonderful skill: "it was low and musical in conversation," so one of his biographers has recorded; "in debate it was high but full, ringing out in moments of excitement like a clarion, and then sinking to deep notes with the solemn richness of organ tones."

In his memorial address on John Adams and Thomas Jefferson (who had both died on July 4, 1826, exactly half a century after the signing of the Declaration of Independence), Webster defined eloquence; and in so doing he characterized the art as he himself triumphantly practiced it. "Nothing is valuable in speech farther than as it is connected with high intelligence and moral endowments. Clearness, force, and earnestness are the qualities which produce conviction. True eloquence, indeed, does not consist in speech. It cannot be brought from far. Labor and learning may toil for it, but they will toil in vain. Words and phrases may be marshaled in every way, but they cannot compass it. It must exist in the man, in the subject, and in the occasion. Affected passion, intense expression, the pomp of declamation, all may aspire to it; they cannot reach it. It comes, if it come at all, like the outbreaking of a fountain from the earth, or the bursting forth of volcanic fires, with spontaneous, original, native force."

It is in the "Reply to Hayne" that Webster attained the summit of his oratory. Then, more than at any other time, do we feel the full conjunction of the man, the subject, and the occasion. Then we find "the clear conception, outrunning the deductions of logic, the high purpose, the firm resolve, the dauntless spirit, speaking on the tongue, beaming from the eye, informing every feature, and urging the whole man onward." If we needed proof that Webster was one of the greatest orators the world has ever known, we can find it in a dozen of his speeches at the bar or in the Senate; but the sole "Reply to Hayne" would be evidence enough. John Fiske went so far as to suggest that "for genuine oratorical power, the 'Reply to Hayne' is probably the greatest speech that has been delivered since the oration of Demosthenes, 'On the Crown,'" which is accepted as the masterpiece of Greek oratory.

The career of Abraham Lincoln (1809-1865) is an integral part of the history of the United States; and there is no need here to set down the details of his life. He was the son of a pioneer who settled first in the backwoods of Kentucky and who later removed to Illinois—frontier states where there was then only scant schooling for the young. But Abraham Lincoln was intensely eager for self-improvement; he profited by all that his few and ill-trained teachers could impart; and he was resolute and untiring in acquiring information and in improving his command of the English language. He fitted himself for the bar and he became one of the foremost lawyers of Springfield, the capital of Illinois. He had experience in the state legislature and in the national Congress; and he was early interested in the most important political question for which a solution had to be found by the American people. He saw the menace of slavery; he gave himself to the duty of combating its extension; and he became the most persuasive and the most powerful of political speakers.

Both as a lawyer in court and as a participant of political debate, Lincoln's desire was always to be perfectly fair to his opponent, to avoid overstatement, to be precise and exact, to be clear, and to put his case so simply that it could not be misunderstood. His early experiences in business, in the legislature and at the bar, helped him to get at the heads and to move the hearts of the plain people, to whom he always addressed himself. He had an abiding integrity; and he was as honest with himself as he was with others.

Abraham Lincoln

He sought always to penetrate to the center of the subject he was trying to master, never contenting himself with half-knowledge, never allowing himself to be fooled by loud-sounding phrases, and never employing empty words in the vain endeavor to befool those to whom he was appealing.

So it was that the uncouth and illiterate youth, born in the backwoods, and thereby excluded from formal education, was able to acquire the art of expression and the art of persuasion, by persistent training at the hand of the severest and strictest of teachers,—himself. As he advanced in years he enriched his vocabulary; he was insistent in informing himself as to the precise meaning of every new word that he added to his store; and he did not rest until he had assured himself as to its full content and as to its limitations. He seems never to have thought about his own writing merely as writing; he made no effort for style; his purpose was to gain so complete a command over words that he could express his thoughts adequately so that all men might understand him, no matter how little education they happened to have. He had an imagination which gave him a sympathetic understanding of the average man; and it was always the average man that he was trying to convert.

As we read the collected letters of Lincoln and the succession of his speeches, we can follow the growth of his mind and the constant improvement in his power of expressing the results of his thinking. We cannot fail to see that in writing and in speaking, he was never thinking about himself or about what others might think of him; his efforts were all bent to persuasion, to the convincing of those who might hear him that slavery threatened the existence of the Union. He was ever sincere and simple; he did not parade verbal ornament; he did not waste words; he stuck closely to the matter in hand. As a result of this self-restraint his method of writing became more artistic as he grew in experience; his words were more aptly chosen, and more harmoniously adjusted; and they came at last to have a cadence which added immeasurably to their emotional appeal.

So it was that when he delivered his "First Inaugural Address" as President of the United States he was, all unknown to himself, a master of language, satisfied to

Executive Mansion
Washington, Nov 21, 1864

To Mrs Bixby, Boston, Mass.

Dear Madam.

I have been shown in the files of the War Department a statement of the Adjutant General of Massachusetts that you are the mother of five sons who have died gloriously on the field of battle. I feel how weak and fruitless must be any word of mine which should attempt to beguile you from the grief of a loss so overwhelming. But I cannot refrain from tendering you the consolation that may be found in the thanks of the Republic they died to save. I pray that our Heavenly Father may assuage the anguish of your bereavement, and leave you only the cherished memory of the loved and lost, and the solemn pride that must be yours to have laid so costly a sacrifice upon the altar of freedom.

Yours very sincerely and respectfully.

A. Lincoln.

employ the commonest words and able somehow to bestow on them the noble elevation of statement, the sweeping amplitude of phrase, and the rhythmic sonority which can be found only in the accredited masterpieces of oratory, ancient and modern. The "Second Inaugural Address" is even better than the first; and the address delivered at the dedication of the battlefield of Gettysburg is a consummate example of high thinking, lofty feeling, and pathetic expression. As Webster's "Reply to Hayne" withstands comparison with the speech of Demosthenes "On the Crown," so Lincoln's "Gettysburg Address" has no rival except the memorial oration of Pericles as reported by the historian Thucydides.

QUESTIONS. — Which of the early American state papers have high literary merit ?

Which of the other political writings of the end of the eighteenth century have permanent value ?

What was the constant theme of Webster's political addresses ?

How did Lincoln train himself to be a master of language ?

Contrast Webster and Lincoln as orators.

With what great Greek orators may they be compared ?

NOTE. — Biographies of Jefferson, Hamilton, Jay, Morris, Madison, Webster, and Lincoln are included in the American Statesmen series (Houghton Mifflin).

XVII "MARK TWAIN"

(SAMUEL LANGHORNE CLEMENS)

THE writers who have been discussed in the last few chapters were poets and story-tellers, essayists and historians. Most of them were college graduates; and they had been trained in the inherited literary traditions. The writer who came to be recognized as the foremost figure in American literature when they had departed one after another was a story-teller and an essayist, but he was first of all a humorist; he was a Westerner, with no allegiance to the older East; he was a self-educated man, schooled by the imperative experience of life; and he had spontaneous originality and he was free from all deference to mere convention. He was a strong man who stood on his own feet and looked at the world fearlessly out of his own honest eyes. He did his own thinking in his own fashion; and he taught himself how to phrase what he thought, so that his meaning was clear to all men. He chose to be known as "Mark Twain"; his real name was Samuel Langhorne Clemens.

He was born November 30, 1835, at Florida, Missouri, and he spent his boyhood at Hannibal, a little town on the Mississippi. What sort of place it was we can see by reading "Tom Sawyer" and "Huckleberry Finn" in which the author drew on the memories of his youth. His father died when he was only twelve, and he had but scant schooling. He worked three years in the local printing office; and he wandered, here and there, as a journeyman printer. When he was seventeen he resolved to become a river pilot; and he has narrated in "Life on the Mississippi" how he learned the river. But after he had mastered the complicated art of the pilot, he was allowed to make his living by it for only two or three years. The Civil War broke out, and the Mississippi was no longer open to steamboats.

Young Clemens was then twenty-five, but he was still boyishly impetuous. He had a very brief service with a company of Confederate volunteers; and then he resigned and accompanied his brother to Nevada. In "Roughing It" he has described his long trip across the plains and the mountains,—recording also many episodes of Western adventure in those early days of mining experiment. It was in Nevada that he began to write, at first as a reporter only, but putting forth now and again humorous sketches which he signed "Mark Twain." From Nevada he went to California, contributing to various journals in San Francisco, and going on a voyage to the Sandwich Islands. It was in San Francisco that he made his first appearance on the lecture platform.

In 1867 his first book was published; it was a volume of comic sketches, and it bore the title of the most famous of his briefer tales, the "Jumping Frog." In the summer of that year he was one of a party who sailed for the Mediterranean in a specially chartered ship. The travelers visited France and Italy, Egypt and the Holy Land; and out of the weekly letters he had written back to a California newspaper, he made up a volume of travels and sketches, called the "Innocents Abroad," which was published in 1869 and which won immediate popularity. It was in this book that Mark Twain first revealed himself to the public as a humorist of large resources, commanding the springs of laughter and reflecting the spectacle of life from an unexpected angle.

In 1870 he married Miss Olivia Langdon, and even in the fortunate annals of American authorship there has been no happier marriage. A little later he settled in Hartford, which was to be his home for a score of years. He published "Roughing It" in 1872; and a few years later there came forth his first effort in fiction, the "Gilded Age," written in partnership with Charles Dudley Warner. The chief figure of this story, Colonel Mulberry Sellers, he put also into a loose-jointed play which was received with pleasure by the playgoing public.

Perhaps it was the success of this first story composed in collaboration which encouraged him to a second effort in fiction in which he relied on himself only. In "Tom Sawyer" he drew on the rich recollections of his own boyish adventures, and he recaptured the full flavor of boyhood. It is in this story that Mark Twain first disclosed his power as a creator of character and as a painter of social conditions. It is a most amusing book, abounding in laughable episodes; but it is also much more than funny, for it tells the truth about life, and it is sustained by a sturdy morality, never protruded but unmistakable, none the less.

The "Adventures of Tom Sawyer" was published in 1875, when the author was just forty, which seems to be the age when a writer has matured enough to be equipped for a longer venture in fiction. In the next few years he gathered together two or three volumes of his briefer writings. Then he went to Europe again; and in 1880 he issued the record of a few of the experiences of this trip in "A Tramp Abroad," a volume quite as funny as the "Innocents Abroad," yet with a more restrained humor and with a broader outlook upon life. His style was still breezy and unconventional and individual; but it was firmer, more vigorous, more assured. On his return to his own country he wrote a second boy's book, the "Prince and the Pauper," a historic fantasy of Tudor times in England, lacking the unconscious intimacy of "Tom Sawyer," but revealing his sympathy with unmerited suffering and his sturdy hatred of meanness and oppression.

Then he returned to the solid ground of his youthful experience and wrote a sequel to "Tom Sawyer," which he called the "Adventures of Huckleberry Finn." This is his masterpiece, and it is one of the masterpieces of the fiction of the English language. It was rooted in knowledge, for its action is confined to the Mississippi valley which he had studied as man and boy. It is an excellent story, full of unforgettable scenes and peopled with vera-cious characters drawn from life and seized in the act. But it is also much more than a mere story, since it is a permanent picture of a vanished civilization; it is a panorama of the picturesque circumstances of the river folk in the years before the Civil War. Mark Twain not only etched the men and women who dwelt along the Mississippi in those days now forever departed, he also caught and made visible to us their sentiments, their prejudices, and their attitude toward the problems of life.

"Huckleberry Finn" was published in 1884; and in 1883 Mark Twain had elaborated an earlier account of his experiences as a cub pilot. This "Life on the Mississippi" is really a series of chapters from his autobiography, just as the earlier "Roughing It" had been. In these two books he was setting down accurately, even though humorously, the things he had seen with his own eyes in his impressionable youth,—things that no other writer had seen. And these books have therefore an abiding value as historical documents supplying information about aspects of American civilization not otherwise accessible. Of course, this supplying of information was not the author's primary purpose, which was rather to amuse by the record of experiences that seemed to him individual and interesting.

His best books are those in which he drew on these experiences, whether he set them down soberly and humorously as matters of fact or dealt with them more liberally as the foundation and the background of fiction. But like other great humorists who had also the sense of reality, like Aristophanes and like Rabelais, he had a fondness for fantasy, for getting away from his own time and his own people and for voyaging back into the past. The "Prince and the Pauper" had been his first venture into historic fiction; and he made a second in 1889 when he published "A Connecticut Yankee at King Arthur's Court." This was a comic romance, in which the author contrasted the old and the new, the ideas of England hundreds of years ago with the ideas of New England in the nineteenth century. This is as broadly funny as any of his writings; and it has passages of pathos as simple as any in the "Prince and the Pauper." Both of these historic fantasies make plain his gentleness and his kindliness, his utter abhorrence of tyranny and cruelty.

There is no need to catalogue the titles of all his later writings, which followed in swift succession during the remaining years of his life. He had the affluent productivity of a large genius; and his complete books extend to more than a score of stately volumes. They were issued in a uniform edition in 1899, when his position in English literature was firmly established. There are, however, three of these later works which demand consideration. One is "Pudd'nhead Wilson," published in 1894; it is another story of real life, with its scene laid in the Mississippi valley that he knew so well; it is a worthy mate of "Tom Sawyer" and of "Huckleberry Finn." Another is "Joan of Arc," a historical novel, published in 1896; it is almost devoid of humor, which would have been wholly out of place in a book with so noble a heroine. Instead of humor this book has dignity and reverence; to many readers it seems to be the least characteristic of all its author's works; but it is a book only Mark Twain could have written. The third of the later writings which demands special notice is the "Man that Corrupted Hadleyburg," published in 1900. This is a brief tale of modern American life; it is a parable, akin to the "Pilgrim's Progress" in its method and in its meaning and able to with-

Dollis Hill House,
A.M.

Aug. 14/00.

Dear Brander :

We-uns are going to be in Dussrow (Wednesday) afternoon, & shall look for you-uns & give you glad welcome, & cake
& Tea in addition thereto.

Yours ever
Mark.
—

stand comparison with that masterpiece of apologue. It has the tense terseness of Swift and the playful ease of Voltaire, without the mean malignity of Swift's misanthropy and without the disintegrating acid of Voltaire's malice.

But before "Joan of Arc" and the "Man that Corrupted Hadleyburg" had been written Mark Twain had met with a sudden misfortune. He had become involved with a publishing house which failed — the same evil fate which had befallen Sir Walter Scott in his old age. Mark Twain was past sixty when he found himself stripped of his earnings and saddled with a load of debt. It might have been possible for him to avoid these obligations, but he determined to clear them off to the last dollar. He set out on a lecturing voyage around the world to make the money needed to pay these debts. The record of this voyage he published in 1897; he called it "Following the Equator," and although it showed signs of fatigue it was a worthy sequel to the "Innocents Abroad" and to "A Tramp Abroad."

Before he returned from this circling of the globe another and deeper sorrow came to him. His eldest daughter died. His had been a singularly happy home and a beautifully united family. The loss of this daughter was a stroke from which the father never recovered. It was followed in a few years by the death of Mrs. Clemens, who had long been an invalid, tenderly cared for by her husband. And then only a few months before his own death, his youngest daughter died as suddenly as the eldest had done. In the last years of his life he had been a wanderer, unwilling to return to Hartford, because of its memories of former happiness; the family had lived here and there in Europe for two or three years. After his return to America and after he had cleared himself from all indebtedness he finally settled down in a house he had built at Redding, Connecticut.

Despite his private griefs, the later years of his life were gladdened by the growing recognition of his position as a chief figure in American literature and as an author of international fame. In 1907 he went over to England to receive a degree from Oxford, an honor which he highly prized. Then he came back to his country home in Connecticut to work on his autobiography, fragments from which he had already allowed to be printed,—fragments which display the deeper side of his nature, the fundamental melancholy in which his exuberant humor was rooted. And it was in this new house of his own that he died, on April 21, 1910, when he was seventy-four years old.

Mark Twain's Residence, Redding, Conn.

Mark Twain was a voluminous writer, and his work is strangely uneven in quality. His taste was uncertain, and sometimes it may even be called perverse. His best books, even "Tom Sawyer" and "Huckleberry Finn," are not sustained at their highest level, and they contain passages which we could wish away, passages out of keeping, passages in which the humor is inexpensive and artificial. There is no need to deny that there were gaps in his equipment, failings of his insight, limitations of his sympathy. It seemed sometimes as though he knew that his readers expected him to be funny at all costs and that he felt himself bound to respond to this unhappy expectation. Although he could make fun, his nature, like that of every other true humorist, was fundamentally serious; and he rejoiced in his later years that he could reveal more often this deeper aspect of his nature. He had intellectual independence, essential sanity, and elemental largeness.

When an author has won a reputation by books that make us laugh, he has to pay the penalty of his humor and it is hard for us to take him seriously. It may be long before we discover that he is more than a mere fun-maker; and it was only in the later years of his life that there was a wide recognition of what ought to have been evident earlier—that Mark Twain was a humorist and a master humorist, beyond all question, but that he was also a storyteller, a stylist, and a moralist. Humor in Mark Twain was free and spontaneous, abundant and individual. It was rarely merely verbal; generally it had its roots deep in the pettinesses and in the inconsistencies of human nature. Often it derived its power from the imperturbability of matter-of-fact narration of a superbly magnified impossibility. It is seen at its richest in the passage in the "Innocents Abroad" wherein Mark Twain weeps over the grave of Adam as a long-lost relative. It is shrewdly disclosed in the account of Tom Sawyer's letting the contract to whitewash his aunt's fence. It is exuberant and irresistible in the "Jumping Frog." His humor is ever good humor, never irreverent, save toward things unworthy, and never mocking save toward things of ill repute.

As a story-teller, as a painter of life, he is to be counted with the masters of fiction. It is true that his work was variable and not always evenly sustained. But it is by his best that he is to be measured. He could tell a story with undeniable power; he could invent situations of compelling interest, serious as well as humorous; and he could create character with commingled imagination and veracity. There are few great moments in fiction finer than that when Tom Sawyer, lost in the cave, sees a light in the distance and discovers that it is held by Indian Joe, his one mortal enemy,—that is worthy of comparison with Robinson Crusoe's finding the solitary footprint in the sand after his long years of loneliness on the island. Equally fine are the Sherburn-Boggs and the Shepherdson-Grangerford episodes in "Huckleberry Finn." And perhaps even deeper in its power, and more poignant in its pathos, is the scene in "Pudd'nhead Wilson" in which the wicked son sells his own mother for a slave.

And the style is equal to the substance. Mark Twain wrote simply, unpretentiously, forcibly; and as he grew in literary ambition his style became firmer and finer. It was not bookish, nor academic, but racy with the flavor of the soil, essentially American, like Franklin's and Lincoln's. He was a master of the vernacular; he had command of the unhackneyed word, unexpected and inevitable. The style was like the man, as it must be in all good writing; it was sincere and manly and wholly devoid of affectation. It was often loftily imaginative, while always perfectly simple,—as in the description of the Jungfrau by moonlight (in the "Innocents Abroad"). It was picturesque and evocative, as in the portraits in the parliamentary dispute in Austria. It was marvelous in its cold transparency, as in the "Man that Corrupted Hadleyburg."

Perhaps it is in the "Man that Corrupted Hadleyburg" that Mark Twain most clearly discloses himself as a moralist. But in the "Prince and the Pauper" and especially in "Huckleberry Finn" it is easy to see that the narrative was supported by a rich understanding of the complexities of human society. He made us think even when he made us laugh. His ethical outlook was all his own, — but it would be well for us if it was ours also.

A humorist, a story-teller, a stylist, and a moralist, — such was Mark Twain, the first and foremost contribution to American literature which has been made by the West. He was not local in his outlook and not sectional; he was not provincial and he was not colonial; he was intensely and essentially American; and his place in the English literature of the nineteenth century is with its leaders.

QUESTIONS. — In what way do the circumstances of Mark Twain's youth differ from those of the New England authors?

In what books has he drawn on the memories of his boyhood?

Which of his books are largely autobiographical?

What were his early travels?

What advance in literary skill did he disclose in "Tom Sawyer" and in "Huckleberry Finn"?

Discuss his three ventures into historical fiction.

What misfortune befell him when he was past sixty?

What gladdened his last years?

What are the more obvious limitations of his writing?

What are the four characteristics which insure his fame?

NOTE. — The complete edition of Mark Twain's works is published by Harper. There is a biography by Albert Bigelow Paine (Harper), who has also edited a copious collection of "Mark Twain's Letters" (Harper).

For criticism, see W. D. Howells's "My Mark Twain" (Harper).

XVIII EUGENE FIELD AND JAMES WHITCOMB RILEY

As all the original settlements of the English-speaking peoples had been made on the Atlantic coast, and as it was only after long years that our ancestors were enabled to thrust themselves across the Alleghanies on their resistless march to the Pacific, it is only natural that the earliest American authors should have been born in the East. So we have found that the earliest group of our writers to attract attention, toward the end of the first quarter of the nineteenth century, were all of them New Yorkers, by residence if not by birth — Irving and Cooper and Bryant. And we have seen that another group, coming forward a score of years later and gathering about Emerson, were all New Englanders.

While the men of both groups were resolutely national in sentiment, they were necessarily more or less sectional in their selection of subject. Irving lays the scene of "Rip Van Winkle" on the banks of the Hudson; and Cooper places the adventures of the "Last of the Mohicans" on the banks of the Mohawk. Hawthorne finds the fit background for the "Scarlet Letter" in Massachusetts; and so does Longfellow for his "Courtship of Miles Standish." Then, as the Middle West slowly filled up, it also produced authors of distinction. Our two foremost orators are Daniel Webster of Massachusetts and Abraham Lincoln of Illinois. Still later, Mark Twain, born in the Southwest, painted for us a flowing panorama of life on the mighty Mississippi as it was in the years just before the Civil War. To-day, in the first quarter of the twentieth century, there are tellers of tales and singers of songs in almost every state of the Union, lovingly dealing with the manners and customs of their own sections.

These studies in local color are more abundant now than ever before, but they had been attempted with only infrequent success by more than one writer of a century ago. The earliest American romancer, Charles Brockden Brown (1771-1810), was a Philadelphian, whose strange and gloomy tales preserve for us the picturesque atmosphere of the end of the eighteenth century in the placid Pennsylvania of those remote times. Two Southern novelists followed Cooper in dealing with the life of their own section. One was John Pendleton Kennedy (1795-1870), who wrote two Virginia stories, "Swallow Barn," published in 1832, and "Horse-Shoe Robinson," published in 1835. The other was William Gilmore Simms (1806-1870), who applied Cooper's method to Southern scenes and characters. Perhaps the most interesting of the many tales due to his facile pen is the "Yemassee," published in 1835.

It would not be overpraising the folk-tales which Uncle Remus told to the little boy if we were to declare them as good as the fables of Aesop or as the fairy stories of the brothers Grimm. The creator of the alluring and enduring figure of Uncle Remus was Joel Chandler Harris (1848-1908). He was a Georgian; and he wrote many stories and sketches of the Southern life and character, revealing intimate knowledge of the people of his section. It was with equal understanding and with equal sympathy that he delineated white folks and black, — although it is by his portrait of a negro, the unforgettable figure of the shrewd Uncle Remus, that his fame is now secure in the affections of the young. This fame was won by his prose; but Harris also wrote verse, most of it in the dialect of the Georgia negroes.

Another American story-teller and poet, who became known a little earlier than Harris and who also used dialect in his verse, was Bret Harte (1839-1902). He was an Easterner by birth who had been taken as a boy to the Pacific coast, where he was greatly impressed by the romance and the picturesqueness which accompanied the sudden rush into California after the discovery of gold. It was the "Argonauts of '49," as he called them, whom he took as the unheroic heroes of his first volume of character-studies, the "Luck of Roaring Camp"; and of all his books this is the freshest in catching the flavor of the soil and the most vigorous in capturing the color of the epoch. It is probable that Bret Harte was inclined to over-sentimentalize his stalwart miners and stage-drivers; and it is certain that his dialect was not so carefully studied from life as that of Mark Twain. His reputation rests rather on his prose than on his verse; and yet several of his humorous lyrics won widespread popularity, notably the one about "The Heathen Chinee."

Bret Harte

It is, however, by their verse and not by their prose

Joel Chandler Harris

that two other writers, identified with the Middle West, are now best remembered. These two are Eugene Field and James Whitcomb Riley. It would not be accurate to assert that their positions in American literature are more important than those of Bret Harte and Joel Chandler Harris. Neither of them created a character as convincing as the Uncle Remus of Harris or painted a gallery of portraits as varied as the "Argonauts of '49" of Harte. Yet there are obvious reasons why they may here be considered in greater detail than their two interesting predecessors. They were unpretending bards, both of them, dealing with homely doings and simple affections; and as a result of their desire to get close to the hearts of the plain people, some of their humble lyrics sang themselves into the memory more easily than the more pretentious efforts of poets of a loftier aspiration but of a lesser inspiration.

Eugene Field

Eugene Field was born in St. Louis on September 2, 1850. His boyhood was spent in New England, where he failed to profit by the opportunity of education as fully as he might. The casualness of his studies is made plain by the fact that when the time came for him to go to college, he wandered from Amherst to Williams, and then a year later from Knox College to the University of Missouri, not working diligently in any one of these institutions and not persevering until graduation. He was a wayward youth, indulging in a succession of harmless pranks and taking scant thought of his own future. In 1872 he came into a little money, which he spent in a trip to Europe, — perhaps as profitable an investment of his heritage as he could have made, since this travel enlarged his acquaintance with life and broadened his background of experience.

On his return from his European wanderings he married Miss Julia Comstock; and he started in to earn his living as a reporter on a St. Louis evening paper. It was by newspaper work of one kind or another that he was able to support himself and his family during the score or more of years that he was to survive. In one capacity or another he worked on various journals in several Missouri cities. In 1881 he joined the staff of a paper in Denver, where he made himself immediately at home and where he first attained more than a local reputation. It was, however, not until he was called to Chicago in 1883 that his name began to be known to a broader public.

Certain of the friends whom he made in Chicago guided his reading and stimulated his interest in books of a more enduring value than those with which he had earlier been content. He was attracted more particularly to the lyrics of Horace; and he began to render into English one or another of these little masterpieces of metrical art. His standards became more exacting; and he studied out for himself the secrets of rhythm and of rime, with a constant delight in metrical experiment.

It was his duty to the newspaper to furnish a daily column of paragraphs dealing with the topics of the time, shooting folly as it flew, satirizing the affectations of the moment. His humor was good humor; and while he held the humbugs up to laughter he did it without malice or bitterness. Of course, most of the paragraphs which Field provided day after day were for that day only; they were airy trifles and quaint whimsies, local and temporary in their interest.

But as he developed in congenial association with his Chicago friends and as his ambition awakened, he began to print in his column poems not called forth by the passing show and not fleeting in their appeal. Some of these were careful translations from Horace and Heine and Béranger. Some of them were boldly humorous lyrics, full of frank fun, felicitous in their rimes and excellent in their recurrent refrains; a few of them were commingled of gentle humor and restrained pathos. A first selection of the most popular of these newspaper poems was published in 1889 as "A Little Book of Western Verse"; and it was favorably received by the reading public, who recognized its sincerity and relished its individuality.

Field's health was uncertain; and in the year which saw the publication of his "Little Book" he made a trip to Europe in the hope that he might be benefited by a change of scene. On his return he took up his newspaper work; and he was encouraged to write more elaborate sketches in prose, endowing them with not a little of the quaintness and the charm characteristic of his lyrics. Another collection of these was issued in 1892 modestly entitled "Second Book of Verse." His health continued precarious; and at the early age of forty-five, he died on Nov. 5, 1895.

Half a dozen volumes of prose are included in the complete edition of Field's works; but his fame is made secure by a score of the poems, grave and gay, which were included in one or another of his volumes of verse. It was by these lilting lyrics, some of them boldly humorous and dressed in picturesque dialect, some of them gently pathetic, that he won his way into the affections of his fellow Americans; who recognized him as one of themselves, as a product of our soil, not possible in any other clime than ours. And of all his more delicate lyrics it is more particularly by those which deal lovingly with childhood that he is likely longest to be remembered, — "Little Boy Blue," for example, and the "Dutch Lullaby" with its recurrent "Wynken and Blynken and Nod." As one of his most intimate friends has recorded, — Eugene Field always felt himself at home in the society of children. "He was forever scanning whatever lies hidden within the folds of the heart of childhood. He knew children through and through because he studied them from themselves and not from books."

James Whitcomb Riley

A similar understanding of childhood was possessed by Field's contemporary, James Whitcomb Riley. He was born in Greenfield, Indiana, in 1853. His schooling was desultory; and the only schoolbook which could hold his attention was the Reader with its alluring lyrics. At sixteen he broke away from home, and wandered off with an itinerant physician, for whom he painted advertisements. A little later he joined two or three other young men who went about the country, painting signs and giving concerts of an unpretending character. Riley varied the program of simple songs by his recitations.

At first he was content to repeat the poems already popular on the platform; but as he delivered them again and again he became dissatisfied with their inconsistencies of word and sentiment; and he began modestly to write character sketches in rime derived from his own observation of life and adjusted to his own powers of impersonation. He was able early to see and to seize the poetry which lies latent in the commonplace, in the everyday life of the average village. The monologues he put together for his own recitation were portrayals of obvious rustic types, dramatic in their self-revelation, and heightened in color by the use of the dialect of the unlettered Indiana farmers. In these character sketches there is often robust gayety and gentle irony; but there is never any satire or any harshness. There is frequently present also a simple pathos, unforced, unstrained, hinted at rather than paraded or insisted on.

Even in his earlier efforts he is always sincere, with a simplicity as direct as Longfellow's. As he advanced in skill he remained resolute in his refusal to be artificial; he was able to conceal his elaborate metrical artistry, his dexterous command over sounds, his adroit craftsmanship; and he succeeded in making his most ingeniously articulated stanzas seem to be unpremeditated and inevitable. In painting his rustic portraits his touch is at once firm and easy; and he often suggests far more than he says, leaving his hearers to fill out the outline from their own familiarity with the model.

For several years Riley worked on one or another of the newspapers of Indiana. It was in these journals that he first published his earlier poems, crediting them to an imaginary farmer, Benjamin F. Johnson of Boone County. The first selection of his local verse, "The Old Swimmin' Hole and 'Leven More Poems," issued in 1883, was sent forth as if it had been written by the non-existent Johnson. Riley's later collections of lyrics were authenticated by his own name, — "Pipes o' Pan at Zekesbury" in 1889, "Rhymes of Childhood" in 1891, "Poems Here at Home" in 1893. He published also half a dozen volumes of prose sketches, which did not win the wide popular appreciation accorded to his verse.

While his reputation was naturally greatest in his native state, it soon spread throughout the Union; and he was encouraged to visit the Atlantic coast and to take part in Authors' Readings. At one time with Mark Twain, and at another with Eugene Field, he formed a partnership for a lecture tour. His convincing delivery of his own compositions was keenly enjoyed by all sorts and conditions of men in all parts of the country, — the cultivated as well as the less educated, both competent to feel the charm, the grace, and the genuineness of his impersonations. But although he wandered through many states, he kept returning to Indiana where he always felt most at home; and it was in Indianapolis that he died on July 22, 1916.

Riley's themes were generally homely and even humble; and he was prone to use dialect as a device for enriching the local color of his character sketches. He was never tempted to draw his illustrations from books, content to rely on his own intimacy with nature and with human nature, and to deal exclusively with the persons and the places, the times and the seasons he had himself observed. But although his own writings were never bookish, he had an unfailing admiration for the lyrics of Shakspeare and

Herrick, Tennyson and Longfellow. He studied their methods and he made himself a master of versification. Yet his poems never smell of the lamp; they seem to be spontaneous, because the poet had the art of concealing his art. Consider this final stanza of one of his best-known lyrics and note how admirably the sound is married to the sense: —

The husky, rusty russel of the tassels of the corn,
And the raspin' of the tangled leaves, as golden as the morn;
The stubble in the furries — kindo' lonesome-like, but still
A-preachin' sermons to us of the barns they grewed to fill;
The strawstack in the medder, and the reaper in the shed;
The hosses in theyr stalls below — the clover overhead! —
O, it sets my heart a-clickin' like the tickin' of a clock,
When the frost is on the punkin and the fodder's in the shock.

There is a bolder pathos and an almost equal felicity of phrasing in the lines "On the Death of Little Mahala Ashcraft": —

"Little Haly! Little Haly!" cheeps the robin in the tree;
"Little Haly!" sighs the clover, "Little Haly!" moans the bee;
"Little Haly! Little Haly!" calls the killdeer at twilight;
And the Katydid and crickets hollers "Haly" all the night.

They's sorrow in the waivin' leaves of all the apple trees;
And sorrow in the harvest-sheaves, and sorrow in the breeze;
And sorrow in the twitter of the swallows 'round the shed;
And all the song her redbird sings is "Little Haly's dead!"

He is never awkward in rhythm or in rime; he is never forced or false in feeling; his tender sentiment never sinks into mere sentimentality; and his verse is never morbid or in a minor key. He is an imaginative realist with a wholesome gladness, due in part, it may be, to his sustaining intimacy with the fields and the streams, the birds and the flowers of his own state and in part to his interpretative sympathy with the men and the women and the children he had known from his youth up. Like Longfellow in his simplicity and in his love for children and in his understanding of their little world, he is also like Whittier in his directness. In fact Riley did for the rustic life of the Middle West what Whittier had done for the rustic life of New England.

QUESTIONS. — Why did the earlier story-tellers deal exclusively with life along the Atlantic Coast?

What is the chief character created by J. C. Harris?

From what group were the characters of Bret Harte sketched?

What was Eugene Field's preparation for literature?

What aspect of life was Field most successful in depicting?

How did James Whitcomb Riley come to write verse?

What types of character did he delineate most successfully?

NOTE. — The complete edition of Bret Harte is published by Houghton Mifflin, and complete editions of Field and Riley's poems are issued by Scribner. "The Life of Bret Harte" by H. C. Merwin is published by Houghton Mifflin. The "Life of William G. Simms" by William P. Trent appears in the American Men of Letters Series (Houghton Mifflin). Slason Thompson's biography of Eugene Field is published by Scribner.

XIX OTHER WRITERS

IN certain respects Parkman must be admitted to be the foremost American historian; but he was only the most interesting of a distinguished group of historical writers. In 1834 Jared Sparks (1789-1866) wrote a life of Washington and edited the letters and other papers of our first President; and he afterward did a like service for other worthies of the Revolutionary period. He preserved for us much valuable material which might otherwise have been lost; but he liked to show his heroes always in full dress, and he omitted facts and altered texts the better to sustain the dignity of history as he understood it.

George Bancroft

In the same year that Sparks published the first volume of his "Washington," George Bancroft (1800-1891) issued the first volume of his massive "History of the United States," a monument of honorable labor and intellectual effort, the tenth and last volume of which was not completed until 1874 — forty years after the book had begun to appear. Bancroft also took part in public affairs, and when Secretary of the Navy he established the Naval Academy now at Annapolis. When collector of the port of Boston he gave an appointment to Hawthorne. He was also minister to Great Britain in 1846, and twenty years later he was minister to Germany.

Another historian, John Lothrop Motley (1814-1877), was our minister to Austria at one time and afterward to Great Britain. He chose for the subject of his studies the rise of the brave little Dutch republic from which the people of the United States have derived so many of their institutions. The first book he devoted to this thrilling theme was published in 1854. After his death his life was written by his friend, Dr. Holmes.

An even more interesting period of history was selected by William Hickling Prescott (1796-1859), who examined the condition of Spain at the time Columbus set forth to discover a new world. This book on "Ferdinand and Isabella" was published in 1837, and it was followed within ten years by books on the Spanish "Conquest of Mexico" and "Conquest of Peru," two of the most marvelous true stories to be found anywhere in the annals of mankind.

William H. Prescott

John Fiske (1842-1901) turned aside from the study of philosophy to the retelling of American history. He wrote an illuminating account of the "Discovery of America"; and he considered in detail the more picturesque periods of the annals of the United States in separate studies devoted to the "Beginnings of New England," "Old Virginia and Her Neighbors," "New France and New England," the "Dutch and Quaker Colonies," and the "American Revolution."

Of even more importance and of wider significance was a succession of volumes devoted to the influence of sea-power upon history. They were written by Alfred T. Mahan (1840-1914) a graduate of the Naval Academy who rose to the rank of admiral. It is not too much to say that Mahan's books were epoch-making and that they exerted a permanent influence upon the authorities of every maritime nation. He also wrote biographies of the two greatest of modern sea-fighters, Nelson and Farragut.

Among the other writers who distinguished themselves in other fields than history, there were poets and story-tellers, essayists and critics, some of them in New England and some in the Middle States. Fitz-Greene Halleck (1790-1867) and Joseph Rodman Drake (1795-1820) joined forces in 1819 in a series of occasional poems. Drake wrote the stirring address to the "American Flag" beginning —

When Freedom from her mountain height,
Unfurled her standard to the air,
She tore the azure robe of night,
And set the stars of glory there.

The final lines as he originally drafted them were these: —

And fixed as yonder orb divine,
That saw thy bannered blaze unfurled,
Shall thy proud stars resplendent shine,
The guard and glory of the world.

Instead of these noble lines Halleck suggested a final quatrain of his own, which Drake accepted, although it is obviously inferior in vigor and in veracity: —

Forever float that standard sheet!
Where breathes the foe but falls before us,
With Freedom's soil beneath our feet,
And Freedom's banner streaming o'er us?

Drake had earlier written in 1816 a charming poem, called the "Culprit Fay," in which he tried to show that the rivers of America were as well fitted for poetic treatment as the rivers of Scotland. Halleck's best-known lyric is the resonant "Marco Bozzaris"; but when Drake died, at the early age of twenty-five, his friend, who was to survive him nearly half a century, composed a beautiful lament, beginning —

Green be the turf above thee,
Friend of my better days!
None knew thee but to love thee,
Nor named thee but to praise.

A friend of Motley's and the editor of his letters was George William Curtis (1824-1892), who was perhaps after Lowell the most charming of American essayists. Curtis wrote a novel or two and a social satire; he was for years a popular lecturer; but his strength is best revealed in the many addresses he delivered, in which he upheld a lofty ideal of American citizenship. Three other essayists may also be mentioned here, George Ripley (1802-1880), who took part in the Brook Farm experiment with Hawthorne and Curtis, and who did much to further scholarship in the United States; E. P. Whipple (1819-1886), who was a Boston lecturer and critic; and Richard Grant White (1821-1885), who edited Shakspeare's works and who wrote frequently about the misuse of words.

Critics and essayists were the two poets Bayard Taylor and E. C. Stedman. Bayard Taylor (1825-1878) was also a journalist, who began his literary career by letters of travel. He wished always to be a poet, but perhaps his most valuable poetic effort was his metrical translation of Goethe's "Faust." Stedman (1833-1908) was a poet of genuine faculty who left journalism for business and who later prepared two volumes of illuminating literary criticism, "Victorian Poets" and "Poets of America." Two Southern poets must not be passed over, Henry Timrod (1829-1867) and Sidney Lanier (1842-1881), both of whom died before their allotted time, partly because of the weakness brought on by exposure while they were fighting for the lost cause.

Bayard Taylor

Edmund C. Stedman

Greater than any of these was Walt Whitman (1819-1892), who is even called by some foreign critics the greatest of all American poets. Whitman was an intense American, renouncing all allegiance to the past and looking to the future with splendid confidence. His stalwart verse was irregular, but often it was beautifully rhythmic. No one of the many tributes to Lincoln, not even Lowell's noble eulogy, is more deeply charged with exalted feeling than Whitman's "O Captain, My Captain."

Although not to be classed as fiction, one book published in the first half of the nineteenth century has all the fascination of Cooper's sea stories. This romantic narrative of the ocean is the "Two Years before the Mast" of Richard H. Dana (1815-1882), which has been called the most truthful account of the everyday life of the American sailor that has ever been written. Bryant declared it to be "as good as 'Robinson Crusoe.'"

Walt Whitman

Certain of the women writers of the United States have attained distinction as poets and as novelists. The earliest of them was Mrs. Rowson (1762-1824), who wrote the pathetic tale of "Charlotte Temple"; and among the latest were Helen Hunt Jackson (1831-1885) and Constance Fenimore Woolson (1848-1894). Mrs. Jackson wrote many books in prose and in verse, but she is best known by her moving appeal for the Indian — an appeal cast in the form of a story and called "Ramona." Miss Woolson was a grand-niece of Cooper's, and she had not a little of his skill in setting down on paper the impression of natural scenery. Her most artistic books are, perhaps, the two volumes of short stories, in one of which she studied life in the South, and in the other of which she depicted the people who dwell on the shores of the great lakes.

Margaret Fuller (1810-1850) was a critic, having high ideals of life and of literature. She was a friend of Emerson's and helped to edit the Dial; and she was a visitor to Brook Farm, while Hawthorne and Curtis and Ripley were there. She died in her prime, being shipwrecked off Fire Island as she was returning from Europe with her baby and her husband, an Italian named Ossoli.

A woman was also the author of the American book which has had the widest circulation both at home and abroad, both in English and in translations into foreign languages. Perhaps to-day on the continent of Europe "Uncle Tom's Cabin" is better known than any other single book of American authorship. It was written by Harriet Beecher Stowe (1811-1896). As a girl she taught school in Cincinnati and had many opportunities of studying Southern life. She married Mr. Stowe in 1836 and moved with him to Maine in 1850. She had a deep feeling against slavery and she thought that everybody would agree with her if only the results of the evil system were understood.

What she tried to do in "Uncle Tom's Cabin" was not to attack slavery but rather to tell the truth about it, so that others would see it as she saw it. She sought to show the good side as well as the bad side; she described the good slave owner and the bad slave owner; she depicted the good slave and the bad slave. She was so free from any hatred of the slave owner himself that the pleasantest character in the book is St. Clair, the charming Southern gentleman, while the coarsest figure of all is the brutal Northern slave driver Legree. It was the system she detested and not the men and women who might be involved in it. This wish to be truthful it is which gives its abiding value to "Uncle Tom's Cabin" and which has obtained for it a life far longer than that of other "novels with a purpose," wherein there is no attempt to set down the facts as they are and let these speak for themselves.

Harriet Beecher Stowe

Thomas Bailey Aldrich (1836-1907) and Richard Watson Gilder (1844-1909) were lyric poets of undeniable charm although not of the highest power. Gilder was long the editor of a leading magazine, and he won distinction also as the ardent advocate of many needed reforms. Aldrich was a story-teller as well as a lyrist, carrying into fiction the ingenious fantasy which characterized his verse. He is best known by his exquisite short story, "Marjorie Daw," and by his vivacious "Story of a Bad Boy," which is almost autobiographic.

Henry James (1843-1916) was an acute critic of modern literature and a novelist of a richly developed individuality. At first he was most interested in presenting international contrasts of character, Americans in Europe and Europeans in America. Born in New York, he spent the later years of his life mainly in England; and a few months before his death he renounced his American citizenship and became a British subject. As he matured he devoted himself more frankly to the subtler intricacies of human conduct; and his style lost its clarity, becoming curiously involved and hesitating.

Among the other story-tellers who were contemporary with James and Aldrich, it must suffice here merely to note the names of Frank R. Stockton (1834-1902), F. Hopkinson Smith (1838-1915), F. Marion Crawford (1854-1909), Henry Cuyler Bunner (1855-1896), Jack London (1876-1916), and "O. Henry" (1867-1910) whose real name was Sydney Porter.

QUESTIONS. — Mention three of the earliest American historians, and state the themes they dealt with.

Mention two later historians, and specify also their topics.

Name the most important poems by Halleck and Drake.

Mention two critics who were at Brook Farm.

Why are Taylor and Stedman remembered?

What do you know about Walt Whitman?

What did Margaret Fuller do?

Discuss the chief book of the most widely known of American authoresses.

Name the chief book by Aldrich.

Discuss the modification of manner to be noted in the literary career of Henry James.

NOTE. — Biographies of Curtis, Ripley, Prescott, Margaret Fuller, Bayard Taylor, and Walt Whitman are to be found in the American Men of Letters series. The life of Motley by Oliver Wendell Holmes is published by Houghton Mifflin.

XX BEGINNING OF THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

THE death of Holmes in the fall of 1894, following fast upon the deaths of Whittier and of Parkman and of Lowell, marked the close of an epoch. The leaders of the great New England group of authors had gone ; and the period of American literature which they had made illustrious was completed. In the first half of the nineteenth century the literary center of the United States had been in New York, where were Irving and Cooper and Bryant. Toward the middle of the century the literary center had shifted to Boston, in which city or in its immediate vicinity were the homes of Emerson, Longfellow, Whittier, Holmes, Parkman, Lowell, and Thoreau. When these had departed they left no successors there of the same relative influence. The nation has been spreading so fast and the men of letters are so scattered, that there is in the early years of the twentieth century no single group of authors whose position at the head of American literature is beyond question.

Although there have never been so many authors as there are to-day, and although the average of literary skill is probably higher than ever before, there is now no towering figure and no dominating personality. And those who are at the head of American literature in the early years of the twentieth century are not men of the same type as the greatly-gifted New Englanders whom they succeeded ; and their aims and their ideals are not the same. They have not the binding tie of birth in the same part of the country, for they come from the South and from the West as well as from the East. In so far as the nation has any literary center, this must be New York again, although there is no common bond of union among the many prominent authors living in the metropolis, and although not a few writers of prominence prefer Boston or Washington or Chicago.

After the death of Lowell and Whittier and Holmes there was left no poet having, as they all three had, at once a high standing and a wide popularity. Poets there are of lofty aspiration and of delicate skill. Other writers of verse there are also who rimed adroitly the common things of life, using the common speech of the people of their own State. The praise of those best qualified to judge has been given rather to the poets of the first of these groups, while it is the verses of the writers of the second group which have been most warmly welcomed by the people as a whole.

Here we find the most marked difference between the poetry of the middle of the last century and that of the present. The best poems of Longfellow and Whittier delighted all classes of Americans; they pleased the plain people as well as the more highly cultivated. "Evangeline" and "Snow-Bound" charmed alike the farmhand and the college professor. But no long poem published recently has achieved this double distinction. Of course such a poem may appear at any moment, but with the increasing vogue of fiction, poetry seems less preëminent than it was in the past. Seventy-five years ago nearly all the writers who stood at the head of American literature were poets. Of the writers who stand at the head of American literature to-day less than half are poets.

There is no dearth of poetry; perhaps it has never been so abundant in America as it is to-day. Its technical merit is undeniable, for never has the accomplishment of verse been possessed by more writers. But perhaps fame is not now won so swiftly by a beautiful lyric as it is by a striking short-story. Therefore the ambitious young author is less tempted to confine himself to verse than he was half a century ago. Fiction is the form of literature in which many of the leading American authors are now more likely to find their natural medium of expression. Both the novel and the short-story flourish now as never before.

Two of the later developments of fiction are especially noteworthy. The first of these is what has been called the "international novel." This name has been given to a study of American character seen against a foreign background. To bring out the difference between the American and the European — and more particularly the profound difference between the American and the Englishman — this has been the object of not a few novels written by American authors. By making this contrast these novelists performed a most useful service, for they helped us to see ourselves as others see us. They forced us to look at ourselves with alien eyes. They compelled us to recognize some of our own peculiarities to which we had chosen to be blind.

Closely akin in method to the international novels have been certain novels of city life. In these stories the complex conditions of society in New York, in Boston, and in Chicago have been studied with conscientious care. Certain aspects of the kaleidoscopic cosmopolitanism of the great cities of the East have been seized by the novelist and by him so presented in his stories that the dweller on the lonely farm in the distant West is enabled to comprehend better than before the conditions of life amid the shifting scenes of the mighty city. This, indeed, is the greatest service the art of fiction can render to mankind; it helps us to understand our fellow-man; it explains us to ourselves.

To perform this service adequately, the aim of the novelist must be to tell the truth about life as he sees it. The aim of the greatest writers of fiction has not been merely to amuse by fanciful and fantastic tales, but to interpret sympathetically the life they themselves best knew. This is what has been done with remarkable success by many of the authors who have taken part in this noteworthy development of American fiction.

Quite as interesting as the "international novel" is the "local short-story." By this is meant the story in which we find set forth the people and the scenery and the dialect of a particular locality—in which there is a strong local flavor and a free use of local color. "Rip Van Winkle" is the first tale of this type, in which there is a sympathetic study of the manners and customs of a special portion of our vast and mingled population. Hawthorne's brief tales present us with New England characters projected against New England backgrounds.

The example set by Irving has been followed by writers who happened to have special knowledge of this or that portion of the country, until there is now hardly a corner of the United States which has not served as the scene of a story of some sort. Many of these local fictions are short-stories, but some of them are long novels. As was natural, New England is the portion which has been most carefully explored. But of late the young writers of the South and of the West have been almost more successful in this department of literature than the writers of New England and of New York. In story and in sketch we have had made known to us the Southern gentleman of the old school, the old negro body-servant, the fieldhand, and the poor white. In like manner we have had faithfully observed and honestly presented to us the more marked types of Western character. What gives its real value to these studies of life in the South and in the West is that they are studies of life, that they have the note of sincerity and of reality, that they are not vain imaginings merely, but the result of an earnest effort to see life as it is and to tell the truth about it—the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

Many of these Southern and Western tales, even more than the New York and New England tales on which they are modeled, abound in humor, which sometimes refines itself into delicate character-drawing, and which sometimes breaks out into more hearty fun. Franklin was perhaps the earliest of American humorists; after him came Irving, and then Lowell; and they have to-day many followers not unworthy of them.

The earlier American historians, Prescott and Motley and Parkman, have also many honorable successors, working to-day as loyally as did their great predecessors. At no time since the United States became an independent nation has there been greater interest in historical study. At no time have more able writers been devoting themselves to the history of our own country.

Although we have now no essayist of the stimulating force of Emerson, and no critic with the insight and the equipment of Lowell, yet there is no lack of delightful essayists and of accomplished critics. Indeed, the general level of American criticism has been immensely raised since the days of Poe. American critics are far more selfreliant in the early years of the twentieth century than they were at the end of the nineteenth century. They have lost the colonial attitude, for they no longer look for light across the Atlantic to England only. They know now that American literature has to grow in its own way and of its own accord. Yet they are not so narrow as they were, and they are ready to apply far higher standards. An American poet or novelist or historian is not now either unduly praised or unduly condemned merely because he is an American. He is judged on his own merits, and he is compared with the leading contemporary writers of England, of France, and of other countries. It is by the loftiest standards of the rest of the world that American literature must hereafter be measured.

QUESTIONS. — Discuss the shifting of the literary center in the United States since the middle of the nineteenth century.

What marked difference is to be found between the poetry of the middle of the nineteenth century and that of the present?

What is meant by the "international novel"?

What is meant by the "local short-story"?

What is it that now gives abiding value to the best American fiction?

What is the present state of American literature in the departments of history and criticism?

A BRIEF CHRONOLOGY OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

- 1607 . . . John Smith explored the Chesapeake Bay.
Landing at Jamestown, April 26.
- 1608 . . . John Smith: "A True Relation of Such Occurrences and Accidents of Note as hath Happened in Virginia."
Quebec founded.
- 1613 . . . Anne Bradstreet born.
- 1616 . . . John Smith: "A Description of New England."
- 1620 . . . Landing of the Pilgrims.
- 1624 . . . John Smith (with others): "The General History of Virginia, New England, and the Summer Isles."
- 1636 . . . Harvard College founded.
- 1639 . . . Increase Mather born.
- 1640 . . . Richard Mather, John Eliot, and other Chief Divines in the Country: "The Whole Book of Psalms Faithfully Translated into English Metre." (The Bay Psalm Book.)
- 1650 . . . Anne Bradstreet: "The Tenth Muse lately Sprung up in America."
- 1661 . . . John Eliot: Translation of the New Testament into Algonquin.
- 1663 . . . Cotton Mather born.
- 1672 . . . Anne Bradstreet died.
- 1689 . . . Cotton Mather: "Memorable Providences relating to Witchcrafts and Possessions."

- 1691 . . . Joshua Scottow: "The New England Primer."
1700 . . . Yale College founded.
1702 . . . Cotton Mather: "Magnalia Christi Americana."
1703 . . . Jonathan Edwards born.
1704 . . . The Boston News-Letter established.
1706 . . . Benjamin Franklin born.
1710 . . . Cotton Mather: "Bonifacius; an Essay upon the Good that is to be Devised and Designed."
1719 . . . The Boston Gazette established.
1721 . . . James Franklin: The New England Courant.
1723 . . . Increase Mather died.
1728 . . . Cotton Mather died.
1732 . . . Franklin: "Poor Richard's Almanack."
1737 . . . Thomas Paine born.
1743 . . . Thomas Jefferson born.
1745 . . . John Jay born.
1746 . . . Princeton College founded.
1749 . . . University of Pennsylvania founded.
1750 . . . Franklin: "Hypothesis for Explaining the Several Phenomena of Thunder Gusts; Opinions and Conjectures Concerning the Properties and Effects of the Electrical Matter."
1751 . . . James Madison born.
1752 . . . Gouverneur Morris born.
1754 . . . Jonathan Edwards: "Freedom of the Will."
King's College founded — now Columbia University.
1757 . . . Alexander Hamilton born.
1758 . . . Franklin: "Father Abraham's Speech."
Jonathan Edwards died.
1762 . . . Mrs. Rowson born.
1764 . . . College of Rhode Island founded — now Brown University.
-

- 1769 . . . Dartmouth College founded.
- 1771 . . . Franklin: First five chapters of "Autobiography" written.
Charles Brockden Brown born.
- 1776 . . . Jefferson: "The Declaration of Independence."
Paine: "Common Sense."
- 1782 . . . First English Bible published in America (at Philadelphia).
Daniel Webster born.
- 1783 . . . Washington Irving born.
- 1787 . . . Jefferson: "Notes on the State of Virginia."
- 1788 . . . Hamilton (with Madison and Jay): "The Federalist."
- 1789 . . . Franklin: "Autobiography" from 1757 to 1759 (written) James Fenimore Cooper and Jared Sparks born.
- 1790 . . . Fitz-Greene Halleck born.
Franklin died.
- 1794 . . . William Cullen Bryant born.
- 1795 . . . Lindley Murray: "English Grammar."
Joseph Rodman Drake and John P. Kennedy born.
- 1796 . . . Prescott born.
- 1800 . . . Daniel Webster: "Fourth of July Speech."
George Bancroft born.
- 1802 . . . Bowdoin College founded.
George Ripley born.
- 1803 . . . Ralph Waldo Emerson born.
- 1804 . . . Hawthorne born.
Hamilton died.
- 1806 . . . Noah Webster: "Compendious Dictionary of the English Language."
Nathaniel P. Willis and William Gilmore Simms born.
- 1807 . . . Henry W. Longfellow and John G. Whittier born.
- 1808 . . . Bryant: "The Embargo."
- 1809 . . . Irving: "History of New York by Diedrich Knickerbocker."
Paine died.

- 1809 . . . Oliver Wendell Holmes, Abraham Lincoln, and Edgar Allan Poe born.
- 1810 . . . Margaret Fuller born.
Charles Brockden Brown died.
- 1812 . . . Harriet Beecher (Stowe) born.
- 1814 . . . Motley born.
- 1815 . . . Richard H. Dana born.
- 1816 . . . Drake: "The Culprit Fay."
Gouverneur Morris died.
- 1817 . . . Bryant: "Thanatopsis" (in the North American Review).
Thoreau born.
- 1819 . . . Drake and Halleck: "The Croaker Poems."
Herman Melville born.
Irving: "The Sketch Book."
James Russell Lowell, Walt Whitman, and E. P. Whipple born.
- 1820 . . . Cooper: "Precaution."
Drake died.
- 1821 . . . Bryant: "Poems."
Cooper: "The Spy."
Richard Grant White born.
- 1822 . . . Irving: "Bracebridge Hall."
Ulysses S. Grant born.
- 1823 . . . Cooper: "The Pilot," and "The Pioneers."
Francis Parkman born.
- 1824 . . . Irving: "Tales of a Traveler."
George W. Curtis born.
- 1825 . . . Webster: "First Bunker Hill Oration."
Bayard Taylor born.
- 1826 . . . Cooper: "The Last of the Mohicans."
Jefferson died.
- 1827 . . . Cooper: "The Prairie."
Poe: "Tamerlane and Other Poems."

- 1829 . . . Cooper: "The Red Rover."
Irving: "The Conquest of Granada."
Henry Timrod born.
Poe: "Al Aaraaf, Tamerlane, and Minor Poems."
- 1830 . . . Cooper: "The Water Witch."
Webster: "Reply to Hayne."
- 1831 . . . Irving: "The Companions of Columbus."
Whittier: "Legends of New England."
- 1832 . . . Irving: "The Alhambra"
Sparks: "Life of Gouverneur Morris."
Kennedy: "Swallow Barn."
- 1833 . . . Longfellow: "Outre-Mer."
Whittier: "Justice and Expediency."
Louisa M. Alcott and Edmund C. Stedman born.
- 1834 . . . Bancroft: "History of the United States."
Jared Sparks: "Life of Washington."
- 1835 . . . Simms: "The Yemassee."
Samuel L. Clemens born.
Kennedy: "Horse-Shoe Robinson."
- 1836 . . . Emerson: "Nature."
Holmes: "Poems."
Madison died.
- 1837 . . . Hawthorne: "Twice-Told Tales" (first series).
Prescott: "Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella."
Emerson: Address on the "American Scholar."
John Burroughs, Edward Eggleston, and William D. Howells born.
- 1838 . . . Poe: "The Narrative of Arthur Gordon Pym."
Whittier: "Ballads and Antislavery Poems."
- 1839 . . . Cooper: "History of the Navy of the United States."
Longfellow: "Hyperion," and "Voices of the Night."
Bret Harte born.
- 1840 . . . Cooper: "The Pathfinder."
R. H. Dana, Jr.: "Two Years before the Mast."

- 1840 . . . Poe: "Tales of the Grotesque and the Arabesque."
Brook Farm Community established.
- 1841 . . . Cooper: "The Deerslayer."
Emerson: "Essays" (first series).
Longfellow: "Ballads and Other Poems."
Lowell: "A Year's Life."
Poe: "The Murders in the Rue Morgue."
University of Michigan opened.
- 1842 . . . Bryant: "The Fountain and Other Poems."
Cooper: "The Two Admirals," and "Wing-and-Wing."
Holmes: "Homeopathy and its Kindred Delusions."
Hawthorne: "Twice-Told Tales" (second series).
Longfellow: "Poems on Slavery."
Sidney Lanier born.
John Fiske born.
- 1843 . . . Longfellow: "The Spanish Student."
Prescott: "History of the Conquest of Mexico."
Poe: "The Gold Bug."
Whittier: "Lays of My Home and Other Poems."
Webster: "Second Bunker Hill Oration."
- 1844 . . . Emerson: "Essays" (second series).
Lowell: "A Legend of Brittany."
- 1845 . . . Lowell: "Conversations on Some of the Old Poets."
Poe: "The Raven and Other Poems."
- 1846 . . . Hawthorne: "Mosses from an Old Manse."
Holmes: "Urania."
Longfellow: "The Belfry of Bruges and Other Poems."
Emerson: "Poems."
Melville: "Typee."
Poe: "The Bells."
- 1847 . . . Longfellow: "Evangeline."
Prescott: "History of the Conquest of Peru."
- 1848 . . . Lowell: "The Biglow Papers" (first series); "A Fable for Critics," and "The Vision of Sir Launfal." Poe: "Eureka, a Prose Poem."

- 1848 . . . Whipple: "Essays and Reviews."
Constance Fenimore Woolson born.
- 1849 . . . Emerson: "Miscellanies."
Irving: "Goldsmith."
Longfellow: "Kavanagh."
Parkman: "The Oregon Trail."
Thoreau: "A Week on the Concord and Merrimac Rivers."
Whittier: "Voices of Freedom."
Poe died.
- 1850 . . . Bryant: "Letters of a Traveler."
Emerson: "Representative Men."
Hawthorne: "The Scarlet Letter."
Irving: "Life of Mahomet and his Successors."
Longfellow: "The Seaside and the Fireside."
Donald G. Mitchell: "Reveries of a Bachelor."
Whittier: "Songs of Labor."
Margaret Fuller died.
- 1851 . . . Hawthorne: "The House of the Seven Gables," "A Wonder-Book for Boys and Girls."
Longfellow: "The Golden Legend."
Parkman: "History of the Conspiracy of Pontiac."
Cooper died.
- 1852 . . . Hawthorne: "The Blithedale Romance," and "The Snow Image and Other Twice-Told Tales."
Harriet Beecher Stowe: "Uncle Tom's Cabin."
Daniel Webster died.
- 1853 . . . Curtis: "The Potiphar Papers."
Hawthorne: "Tanglewood Tales for Boys and Girls."
- 1854 . . . Thoreau: "Walden."
- 1855 . . . Irving: "Life of Washington," and "Wolfert's Roost."
Longfellow: "Hiawatha."
Whitman: "Leaves of Grass."
- 1856 . . . Curtis: "Prue and I."
Emerson: "English Traits."
Motley: "The Rise of the Dutch Republic."
- 1858 . . . Holmes: "The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table."
Longfellow: "The Courtship of Miles Standish."

- 1859 . . . Bryant: "Letters from Spain and Other Countries."
Irving and Prescott died.
- 1860 . . . Emerson: "The Conduct of Life."
Hawthorne: "The Marble Faun."
Motley: "United Netherlands."
Whittier: "Home Ballads."
Holmes: "The Professor at the Breakfast Table."
- 1861 . . . Holmes: "Elsie Venner," and "Songs in Many Keys."
- 1862 . . . Thoreau died.
- 1863 . . . Bryant: "Thirty Poems."
Hawthorne: "Our Old Home."
Thoreau: "Excursions."
Longfellow: "Tales of a Wayside Inn."
Whittier: "In War Time."
Lincoln: "Gettysburg Oration."
- 1864 . . . Lowell: "Fireside Travels."
Thoreau: "The Maine Woods."
Hawthorne died.
- 1865 . . . Parkman: "Pioneers of France in the New World."
Thoreau: "Cape Cod."
Lincoln died.
- 1866 . . . Thoreau: "A Yankee in Canada."
Whittier: "Snow-Bound."
Jared Sparks died.
- 1867 . . . S. L. Clemens: "The Celebrated Jumping Frog."
Holmes: "The Guardian Angel."
Lanier: "Tiger Lilies."
Longfellow: Translation of Dante.
Lowell: "The Biglow Papers" (second series).
Whittier: "The Tent on the Beach."
Parkman: "The Jesuits in North America."
Halleck, Willis, and Timrod died.
- 1868 . . . Louisa M. Alcott: "Little Women."
Hawthorne: "Passages from American Notebooks."
Whittier: "Among the Hills."
- 1869 . . . Aldrich: "The Story of a Bad Boy."

- 1869 . . . S. L. Clemens: "Innocents Abroad."
Lowell: "Under the Willows," and "The Cathedral."
Parkman: "La Salle."
Harriet Beecher Stowe: "Old Town Folks."
- 1870 . . . Bryant: Translation of the "Iliad."
Emerson: "Society and Solitude."
Bret Harte: "The Luck of Roaring Camp."
Hawthorne: "English Notebooks."
Lowell: "Among My Books."
Bayard Taylor: Translation of the first part of "Faust."
Whitman: "Democratic Vistas."
Whittier: "Miriam," and "Ballads of New England."
J. P. Kennedy and W. G. Simms died.
- 1871 . . . Louisa M. Alcott: "Little Men."
Burroughs: "Wake-Robin."
Eggleston: "The Hoosier Schoolmaster."
Hawthorne: "French and Italian Notebooks."
Howells: "Their Wedding Journey."
Longfellow: "The Divine Tragedy."
Lowell: "My Study Windows."
- 1872 . . . S. L. Clemens: "Roughing It."
Holmes: "The Poet at the Breakfast Table."
Longfellow: "Three Books of Song."
Whittier: "The Pennsylvania Pilgrim."
- 1873 . . . Aldrich: "Marjorie Daw."
- 1874 . . . Holmes: "Songs of Many Seasons."
Howells: "A Foregone Conclusion."
Longfellow: "The Hanging of the Crane."
Parkman: "The Old Régime in Canada."
Whittier: "Hazel Blossoms," and "Mabel Martin."
- 1875 . . . Burroughs: "Winter Sunshine."
Emerson: "Letters and Social Aims."
Longfellow: "The Masque of Pandora."
W. T. Sherman: "Memoirs."
Stedman: "Victorian Poets."
- 1876 . . . S. L. Clemens: "Tom Sawyer."

- 1876 . . . Sidney Lanier: "Poems."
Lowell: "Three Memorial Poems."
Johns Hopkins University opened.
- 1877 . . . Burroughs: "Birds and Poets."
Parkman: "Count Frontenac."
Motley died.
- 1878 . . . Holmes: "Motley."
James: "French Poets and Novelists."
Longfellow: "Keramos."
Whittier: "The Vision of Echard."
Bryant and Bayard Taylor died.
- 1879 . . . Cable: "Old Creole Days."
James: "An International Episode."
Stockton: "Rudder Grange."
- 1880 . . . Cable: "The Grandissimes."
Joel Chandler Harris: "Uncle Remus."
Holmes: "The Iron Gate."
Howells: "The Undiscovered Country."
Longfellow: "Ultima Thule."
George Ripley died.
- 1881 . . . Whittier: "The King's Missive."
Sidney Lanier died.
- 1882 . . . S. L. Clemens: "The Prince and the Pauper."
F. Marion Crawford: "Mr. Isaacs."
Howells: "A Modern Instance."
Longfellow: "In the Harbor."
Lounsbury: "James Fenimore Cooper."
Emerson, Longfellow, and R. H. Dana died.
- 1883 . . . S. L. Clemens: "Life on the Mississippi."
J. Whitcomb Riley: "The Old Swimmin'-Hole."
Whittier: "The Bay of Seven Islands."
- 1884 . . . H. C. Bunner: "Airs from Arcady."
Cable: "The Creoles of Louisiana."
S. L. Clemens: "Huckleberry Finn."
Helen Hunt Jackson: "Ramona."
Parkman: "Montcalm and Wolfe."

- 1885 . . . U. S. Grant: "Personal Memoirs."
 Howells: "The Rise of Silas Lapham."
 Stedman: "Poets of America."
 U. S. Grant, Richard Grant White, and Helen Hunt Jackson died.
- 1886 . . . Frances Hodgson Burnett: "Little Lord Fauntleroy."
 Lowell: "Democracy and Other Addresses."
- 1887 . . . Stedman: "Library of American Literature."
 Mary E. Wilkins: "A Humble Romance."
- 1888 . . . Holmes: "Before the Curfew."
 Lowell: "Political Essays."
 Riley: "Old-Fashioned Roses."
 Louisa M. Alcott died.
- 1889 . . . Burroughs: "Indoor Studies."
 Howells: "A Hazard of New Fortunes."
 Roosevelt: "The Winning of the West."
- 1890 . . . Holmes: "Over the Teacups."
 Mahan: "The Influence of Sea-Power upon History."
 Nicolay and Hay: "Abraham Lincoln."
- 1891 . . . Garland: "Main-traveled Roads."
 Howells: "Criticism and Fiction."
 Lowell: "Latest Literary Essays."
 Bancroft, Lowell, and Melville died.
- 1892 . . . Lowell: "The Old English Dramatists."
 Parkman: "A Half Century of Conflict."
 Stedman: "The Nature and Elements of Poetry."
 Whittier: "At Sundown."
 G. W. Curtis, Whittier, and Whitman died.
 University of Chicago opened.
- 1893 . . . Fuller: "The Cliff Dwellers."
 Parkman died.
- 1894 . . . S. L. Clemens: "Pudd'nhead Wilson."
 Holmes and Constance Fenimore Woolson died.
- 1895 . . . Fuller: "With the Procession."
 Roosevelt and Lodge: "Hero Tales of American History "

- 1896 . . . Mrs. H. B. Stowe and H. C. Bunner died.
- 1897 . . . Eliot: "American Contributions to Civilization."
Roosevelt: "American Ideals."
- 1898 . . . Seton-Thompson: "Wild Animals I have Known."
- 1899 . . . Howells: "Their Silver Wedding Journey."
- 1900 . . . Clemens: "The Man that Corrupted Hadleyburg."
Howells: "Literary Friends and Acquaintance."
Roosevelt: "The Strenuous Life."
Warner died.
- 1901 . . . Howells: "Heroines of Fiction."
John Fiske died.
- 1902 . . . Wister: "The Virginian."
Bret Harte and Stockton died.
- 1903 . . . Howells: "Letters Home."
- 1904 . . . Howells: "The Son of Royal Langbrith."
- 1905 . . . Higginson: "Part of a Man's Life."
Wharton: "The House of Mirth."
- 1906 . . . Rhodes: "History of the United States" (concluded).
- 1907 . . . Butler: "True and False Democracy."
Aldrich died.
- 1908 . . . Stedman and J. C. Harris died.
- 1909 . . . Brownell: "American Prose-Masters."
Emerson: "Journals."
Gilder and F. Marion Crawford died.
- 1910 . . . Howells: "My Mark Twain."
"O. Henry" and S. L. Clemens died.
- 1911 . . . Deland: "The Iron Woman."
Wharton: "Ethan Frome."
- 1912 . . . Burroughs: "Time and Change."
Paine: "Mark Twain."
- 1913 . . . Roosevelt: "An Autobiography." Lodge: "Early Memories."

- 1914 . . . James: "Notes of a Son and Brother."
Mahan died.
- 1915 . . . Churchill: "A Far Country."
- 1916 . . . Howells: "Leatherwood God."
Riley and Henry James died.
- 1917 . . . Butler: "World in Ferment."
Garland: "Son of the Middle Border."
Paine: "Mark Twain's Letters." -

INDEX

- Aldrich, Thomas Bailey, 244.
 "Marjorie Daw," 244.
 "Story of a Bad Boy," 244.
- Bancroft, George, 238.
- Bradstreet, Anne, 17.
- Brown, Charles Brockden, 228.
- Bryant, William Cullen, 69-80.
 boyhood of, 69, 70.
 his study of law, 70.
 "Thanatopsis," 71, 72.
 "Inscription for the Entrance to a Wood," 71.
 marriage of, 71.
 "The Yellow Violet," 72.
 journalistic career of, 74.
 "Letters of a Traveler," 75.
 "Letters from the East," 76.
 as public speaker, 76.
 "Thirty Poems," 77.
 translation of "Odyssey," 77.
 translation of "Iliad," 77.
 death of, 78.
 estimate of, 78, 79.
- Bunner, Henry Cuyler, 245.
- Clemens, Samuel L. ("Mark Twain"), 215-226.
 boyhood of, 216.
 "The Jumping Frog," 217.
 visits to Europe, 217, 218, 222.
 "Innocents Abroad," 217.
 marriage of, 217.
 "Roughing It," 217.
 "The Gilded Age," 217.
 "Tom Sawyer," 217, 218.
 "A Tramp Abroad," 218.
 "Prince and Pauper," 218.
 "Huckleberry Finn," 218, 219.
 "Life on the Mississippi," 219.
 "A Connecticut Yankee at King Arthur's Court," 220.
- Clemens, Samuel L. — Continued
 "Pudd'nhead Wilson," 220.
 "Joan of Arc," 220.
 "The Man that Corrupted Hadleyburg," 220. misfortunes of, 222.
 "Following the Equator," 222.
 death of, 223.
 estimate of, 224-226.
- Cooper, James Fenimore, 56-68.
 boyhood of, 57, 58.
 his year's cruise, 58.
 midshipman in navy, 58, 59.
 marriage of, 59.
 life at Mamaroneck, 59.
 "Precaution," 60.
 "The Spy," 62.
 "The Pioneers," 62.
 "The Last of the Mohicans," 63.
 "The Pathfinder," 63.
 "The Deerslayer," 63.
 "The Prairie," 63.
 "Leatherstocking Tales," 62, 63.
 "The Pilot," 64.
 "The Red Rover," 64.
 "The Two Admirals," 64.
 "The Wing-and-Wing," 65.
 "History of United States Navy," 65.
 "The Wept of Wish-ton-Wish," 65.
 "The Bravo," 65.
 "The Headsman," 65.
 hostility against, 65.
 "Bread and Cheese Lunch," 65.
 death of, 66.
 estimate of, 66, 67.
- Crawford, F. Marion, 245.
- Curtis, George William, 241.
- Dana, Richard H., 242.
- Drake, Joseph Rodman, 240.
 "Culprit Fay," 240.

- Edwards, Jonathan, 18-20.
 Emerson, Ralph Waldo, 96-112.
 boyhood of, 97.
 education of, 97, 98.
 marriage of, 99.
 visits to Europe, 99, 106, 109.
 friendship with Carlyle, 99.
 lectures of, 99, 100, 109.
 "Nature," 100.
 "The American Scholar," 100.
 estimate of, 101, 102, 111.
 editor of the Dial, 101.
 "Essays," First and Second Series, 101.
 "Poems," 103.
 "Representative Men," 106.
 "English Traits," 107.
 "Conduct of Life," 109.
 "Natural History of the Intellect," 110.
 "Letters and Social Aims," 110.
 death of, 110.
- Field, Eugene, 230-233.
 youth of, 230.
 visit to Europe, 231.
 marriage of, 231.
 journalistic career of, 231.
 "A Little Book of Western Verse," 232.
 "Second Book of Verse," 232.
 estimate of, 232, 233.
 death of, 232.
- Fiske, John, 239.
- Franklin, Benjamin, 21-39.
 boyhood of, 21-25.
 purchases Pennsylvania Gazette, 25.
 marriage of, 25.
 "Poor Richard's Almanack," 25-29.
 inventions of, 28.
 official positions of, 29.
 Commissioner to England, 30, 31.
 "Rules for Reducing a Great Empire to a Small One," 31.
 member Second Continental Congress, 31.
 American Minister to France, 31, 32.
 "Autobiography," 32, 37.
 death of, 33.
 estimate of, 33-39.
- Fuller, Margaret, 243.
- Gilder, Richard Watson, 244.
- Halleck, Fitz-Greene, 240, 241.
 "Marco Bozzaris," 241.
- Hamilton, Alexander, 206.
- Harris, Joel Chandler, 228, 229.
- Harte, Bret, 229.
 "The Luck of Roaring Camp," 229.
- Hawthorne, Nathaniel, 113-126.
 boyhood of, 113, 114.
 education of, 114.
 "Twice-Told Tales," 116.
 marriage of, 116.
 "Mosses from an Old Manse," 117.
 "The Scarlet Letter," 119.
 "The House of the Seven Gables," 119.
 "A Wonder Book for Girls and Boys," 120.
 "Tanglewood Tales," 120.
 "The Blithedale Romance," 120.
 consul to Liverpool, 122.
 "The Marble Faun," 122.
 "Our Old Home," 124.
 death of, 124.
 estimate of, 125, 126.
- Henry, O. (Porter, Sydney), 245.
- Holmes, Oliver Wendell, 158-170.
 boyhood of, 158.
 education of, 159.
 "Old Ironsides," 159.
 his study of medicine, 160.
 visits to Europe, 160, 168.
 marriage of, 162.
 "The Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table," 163.
 "The Professor at the Breakfast-Table," 164.
 "Over the Teacups," 164, 169.
 "Pages from an Old Volume of Life," 164.
 "Medical Essays," 164.
 "Elsie Venner," 165, 166.
 "The Guardian Angel," 165.
 "A Mortal Antipathy," 165, 166.
 "John Lothrop Motley," 166.
 "Ralph Waldo Emerson," 166.
 "Poems," 167, 168.
 "Our Hundred Days in Europe," 169.
 "Before the Curfew," 169.
 death of, 169.
 estimate of, 169, 170.
- Irving, Washington, 40-55.
 boyhood of, 40-42.

Irving, Washington — Continued

- his study of law, 42.
- visits to Europe, 42, 45, 50.
- "Salmagundi," 43.
- death of Matilda Hoffman, 44.
- "Knickerbocker's New York," 44, 45.
- "Sketch Book," 48-50.
- "Bracebridge Hall," 49, 50.
- "Tales of a Traveler," 49.
- "Columbus," 50, 51.
- "Companions of Columbus," 51.
- "Conquest of Granada," 51.
- "Alhambra," 51, 52.
- his home at Tarrytown, 52, 53.
- Minister to Spain, 52.
- "Goldsmith," 53.
- "Mahomet," 53.
- "Wolfert's Roost," 53.
- "Life of Washington," 54.
- death of, 54.
- estimate of, 54, 55.

Jackson, Helen Hunt, 243.

James, Henry, 245.

Jay, John, 206.

Jefferson, Thomas, 205.

author of Declaration of Independence, 205.

Kennedy, John Pendleton, 228.

Lanier, Sidney, 242.

Lincoln, Abraham, 210-214.

education of, 210.

as a lawyer, 211.

letters of, 212.

"First Inaugural Address," 212.

"Second Inaugural Address," 214.

"Gettysburg Address," 214.

estimate of, 212.

London, Jack, 245.

Longfellow, Henry Wadsworth, 127-140.

boyhood of, 128.

education of, 129.

visits to Europe, 129, 137.

marriage of, 129, 132.

"Outre-Mer," 129.

professorship at Harvard, 130.

"Hyperion," 130.

"Voices of the Night," 131.

"Ballads," 131.

"Poems on Slavery," 132.

Longfellow, Henry W. — Continued

"The Spanish Student," 132.

"Belfry of Bruges," 132.

"Evangeline," 132.

"Kavanagh," 132.

"The Seaside and the Fireside," 133.

"The Song of Hiawatha," 134.

"Courtship of Miles Standish," 134.

translation of "Divine Comedy," 135.

"Tales of a Wayside Inn," 137.

"Christus, a Mystery," 137.

"The Masque of Pandora," 137.

"Judas Maccabaeus," 137.

later poems, 138.

death of, 138.

estimate of, 139.

Lowell, James Russell, 178-193.

boyhood of, 178, 179.

education of, 179, 180.

marriage of, 181.

abolitionist, 181, 182.

"The Bigelow Papers," 183, 184, 187.

"Fable for Critics," 183, 184.

"Vision of Sir Launfal," 184.

visit to Europe, 185.

lectures on the English poets, 185.

professorship at Harvard, 186.

editor of The Atlantic, 186.

"Fireside Travels," 186.

"The Cathedral," 187.

"Under the Willows," 187.

"Among my Books," 187, 188.

"My Study Windows," 187.

estimate of, 188, 190, 192.

"Three Memorial Poems," 189.

Minister to Spain, 189.

"Democracy," 189, 190.

"Political Essays," 190.

"Heartsease and Rue," 190.

death of, 192.

Madison, James, 206.

Mahan, Alfred T., 239, 240.

Mather, Cotton, 17, 18.

Mather, Increase, 17.

Morris, Gouverneur, 205.

Motley, John Lothrop, 238, 239.

Paine, Thomas, 205.

"Common Sense," 205.

Parkman, Francis, 194-203.

boyhood of, 195.

- Parkman, Francis — Continued
 education of, 195.
 life among the Indians, 196.
 "The Oregon Trail," 197.
 his ill health, 197-199.
 "The Conspiracy of Pontiac, 198.
 "Pioneers of France in the New World," 200.
 "The Jesuits in North America," 200.
 "La Salle and the Discovery of the Great West," 200.
 "Count Frontenac and New France," 200.
 "A Half Century of Conflict," 200.
 "Montcalm and Wolfe," 200.
 marriage of, 202.
 professorship at Harvard, 202.
 death of, 202.
 estimate of, 202.
- Poe, Edgar Allan, 81-95.
 boyhood and education of, 82-84.
 enlistment in army, 84.
 "Tamerlane and Other Poems," 85.
 "Poems," 85.
 "Manuscript Found in a Bottle," 85.
 editor, Southern Literary Messenger, 85.
 marriage of, 86.
 "Narrative of Arthur Gordon Pym," 86.
 "Tales of the Grotesque and Arabesque," 87.
 "Murders in the Rue Morgue," 90.
 "The Gold Bug," 90.
 life in New York, 90-92.
 "The Raven and Other Poems," 91.
 estimate of, 92, 94.
 "The Bells," 92.
 "Eureka," 93.
 death of, 94.
- Porter, Sydney ("O. Henry"), 245.
- Prescott, William Hickling, 239.
- Riley, James Whitcomb, 233-237.
 "The Old Swimmin' Hole," 235.
 "Pipes o' Pan at Zekesbury," 235.
 "Rhymes of Childhood," 235.
 "Poems Here at Home," 235.
 lecture tour, 235.
 death of, 235.
 estimate of, 234-237.
- Ripley, George, 241.
- Rowson, Susanna H., 243.
- Simms, William Gilmore, 228.
- Smith, Captain John, 16.
- Smith, F. Hopkinson, 245.
- Sparks, Jared, 238.
- Stedman, E. C., 241, 242.
- Stockton, Frank R., 245.
- Stowe, Harriet Beecher, 243, 244.
 "Uncle Tom's Cabin," 243, 244.
- Taylor, Bayard, 241.
- Thoreau, Henry David, 171-177.
 boyhood and education of, 172.
 life at Walden, 172.
 "A Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers," 173.
 "Walden," 173, 174.
 death of, 175.
 estimate of, 175, 177.
 "Maine Woods," 175.
 "Cape Cod," 175.
- Timrod, Henry, 242.
- Twain, Mark (See Clemens, Samuel L.).
- Webster, Daniel, 207-210.
 official positions of, 207.
 orations of, 208, 209.
 "Reply to Hayne," 208, 210.
 estimate of, 209, 210.
- Whipple, E. P., 241.
- White, Richard Grant, 241.
- Whitman, Walt, 242.
- Whittier, John Greenleaf, 141-157.
 boyhood and education of, 141-145.
 journalistic career of, 145.
 work for antislavery movement, 146.
 "Legends of New England," 147.
 "Voices of Freedom," 147.
 life at Amesbury, 149.
 "Lays of My Home," 149.
 "Songs of Labor," 150.
 "Home Ballads," 150.
 "In War Time," 151.
 "Snow-Bound," 151.
 "Tent on the Beach," 151.
 "Among the Hills," 151.
 "Ballads of New England," 153.
 "Mabel Martin," 153.
 "The King's Missive," 153.
 "At Sundown," 153.
 death of, 153.
 estimate of, 153-156.
- Woolson, Constance Fenimore, 243.

